Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] are detained on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Arizona has asked for the yeas and nays on his amendment. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, of course, Mr. President, if the Senate refuses me the yeas and nays I shall be obliged to consume considerable time in order to convince the Senate that it ought to grant the yeas and nays, because of course the bill is not going to pass until the yeas and nays are called on this amendment.

Senators have been very industrious——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the Senator announces that he will annoy the Senate into doing what he wants?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir; I want the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I raise the point of order that the Senator has spoken twice on this matter, and it is not now in order for him to address the Senate again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator spoken twice to-day?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And twice on the amendment?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir; I have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then that seems to be the end of the Senator's rights under the rule.

Mr. ASHURST. Well, I will, of course, submit. I am overpowered. My very learned and beloved friend, the chairman of the committee, has been industriously going about and urging Senators not to grant the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I should not have made the point of order except that the Senator boldly declared that his purpose was to torture the Senate into doing what he wanted it to do.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am defeated, and I yield as gracefully as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A division is called for. All in favor of the amendment will rise. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The amendment is lost.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have already been refused.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I reserve the right to offer the amendment in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to do that. The bill is still open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether he expects to get a vote on the bill to-night? I have it in mind to submit certain observations, but I do not want to do so to-night, and I will not do so at great length at any time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I have been anxious every day for several days to get a vote, and I confidently expected a vote to-day; but the Senate, in the exercise of its privilege, has debated the matter longer than I expected, as Senators had a right to do. At this late hour I would not be willing to pursue a course that would compel the Senator from Iowa to address the Senate when he would prefer to put it off until to-morrow.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota to pay the expenses of the general council of that tribe to be held at Ball Club, Minn., July, 1919, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, January 23, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee, our God and our Father, for the endowments of mind and soul with which Thou hast blessed us; for the knowledge which by experience and research we have accumulated; and we pray for wisdom, that we may use the endowments and our knowledge for the uplift of humanity, that Thy kingdom may be advanced upon the earth. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RATIFICATION OF PROHIBITION AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has certificates from authorities of certain States that the prohibition amendment has been ratified, from the States of Colorado, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, Florida, Indiana, Washington, Oregon, Nebraska, and North Dakota, and they will be filed in the archives of the House.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14516, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14516, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, with Mr. FERRIS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14516, the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14516) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Interpreter to legation and consulate general to Persia, $2,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. The committee throughout this title, I notice, have increased the salaries of interpreters and student interpreters herein from $500 to $1,000, in a few instances, possibly not aggregating as much as that. I would like to inquire the reason for the committee's action in making this decided increase in these interpreters and student interpreters?

Mr. FLOOD. The reason which actuated the committee was the statement of the officials of the State Department made to the committee that it was impossible to get the proper kind of men to accept those positions now at the present salaries. They are not able to live on the salaries, and they could not get Americans to take up these difficult languages and learn them so as to be efficient interpreters, and if they could not the result would be we would be dependent upon non-Americans to render this necessary and valuable service to our representatives abroad, and that would be the case at times when it was essential to have Americans in all of our diplomatic and consular service. The interpreter to legation and consulate general to Persia is getting $1,000 a year. They just could not expect a man of sufficient intelligence, an American citizen, to stay there for that salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee whether this position has been heretofore filled by an American citizen or whether the position was not accorded to some native who was acquainted with the English language and the native language?

Mr. FLOOD. The attempt has been to fill it with Americans, but they have sometimes been unable to do that on account of the salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would question whether it was ever intended to fill the position of interpreter and keep him continuously employed on that work at a salary of $1,000 in Persia.

Mr. FLOOD. The effort has been made to get American citizens in the student interpreter corps. American citizens go in the student corps and study these languages and then they are promoted into interpreters, and the effort has been and desire is to have all Americans. They have been unable sometimes to get Americans for the reason of the inadequacy of the salary and the argument appealed to the committee, and we made an increase for that reason, because we want to Americanize the entire Consular and Diplomatic Service, and I will say to the gentleman most of the increases in this bill are directed to that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. What are these student interpreters provided in the second paragraph following doing during their matriculation?

Mr. FLOOD. During the course of study they render some service to the legations as clerks, but not a great deal, because their time is practically taken up in study. We provide a teacher for each student interpreter, and their time is principally taken up in the study of these languages, but such time as they can spare they render services in the way of interpreting and other things at the consulates or legations or the embassies to which they may be nearest.

Mr. STAFFORD. What salary do they receive after they complete the course of study?

Mr. FLOOD. They are promoted from students to interpreters, and they have been receiving a salary of $1,000 to $1,500.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the provision in the bill that they have been receiving that salary upon their graduation?

Mr. FLOOD. When they finish their course of study, when they acquire sufficient knowledge of these languages to become interpreters, they are made interpreters, and as interpreters have been getting from $1,000 to $1,500 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the item in the bill providing for their payment after they graduate as full interpreters?

Mr. FLOOD. The item the gentleman read, interpreter to legation and consulate general to Bangkok, Siam.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the only provision in this bill for the employment of two interpreters?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. One as the interpreter to legation and consulate general to Persia and the other as the interpreter to legation and consulate general to Bangkok, Siam?

Mr. FLOOD. No; there are some more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to have the gentleman point out any provision for the employment of full interpreters.

Mr. FLOOD. The Consular Service has a number of interpreters.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly point out the item in the bill which provides for their employment after they graduate from these classes of instruction?

Mr. FLOOD. That is paid out of the fund providing for the salaries of consular offices, out of a lump sum.

We have in the service now quite a number of interpreters.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am more concerned as to salaries they are receiving on their graduation. Certainly, if they receive $1,500 as students, they would receive more when they qualify to perform the work of the Government as interpreters.

Mr. FLOOD. In some of the consulates they receive $2,000 a year. There are 16 of them in addition to these to whom the gentleman refers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not a fact that no interpreter who is paid out of the lump-sum allowance for pay of consulates receives less than $2,000 a year?

Mr. FLOOD. I think so; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, to the present paragraph I will withdraw the reservation of the point of order. The chairman has made out a meritorious case.

The Clerk read as follows:

Interpreter to legation and consulate general to Bangkok, Siam, $2,000.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In the course of the debate yesterday afternoon I referred to an item on page 2 of the bill, line 10, being an appropriation for the salary of our minister to Costa Rica. Our minister to Costa Rica is Mr. Edward J. Hale, of North Carolina. I stated at that time that it was my information that Mr. Hale had returned from Costa Rica two years ago or thereabouts to his home in North Carolina and had enjoyed life in North Carolina ever since. That statement, I understand, was not disputed, but my further statement, that during that entire two years he had been also enjoying the payment of the full salary of $10,000 a year for doing nothing, was disputed by the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD]. I called this morning at the State Department to get the information about the case, because I had no desire to mislead the House even innocently.

I am informed that the facts are these: That Mr. Hale came back from Costa Rica in April, 1917; that he went to his home in North Carolina and has never been back to Costa Rica during the almost two years which have since intervened; that he has done no Government work; that he has performed no diplomatic functions of any kind during that period; but that he has been regularly in receipt of the full salary of $10,000 a year during the entire time.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is there not any process by which you can stop such stealing as that from the Treasury?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. What is it?

Mr. FLOOD. The process, if the gentleman is correct, and if the State Department officials correctly stated it to him, is that the official who is responsible for it should be impeached, because it is a clear violation of the law. Section 1742 provides that they shall not receive salary for the time during which they may be absent, by leave or otherwise, for a period exceeding 60 days in any one year. If anyone in the State Department has allowed Mr. Hale to stay away from his post of duty for two years without doing any Government work or rendering any service to the Government and draw his salary that official has violated the statute law of this country. Will the gentleman name the man who is responsible for it?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know who is responsible for it. It is the gentleman's administration.

Mr. FLOOD. Who at the State Department gave the gentleman this information?

Mr. ROGERS. The information is a fact. I do not see why I should bring in the individual's name.

Mr. FLOOD. I called up the State Department this morning and was told that it could not be a fact, owing to the law I have referred to.

Mr. ROGERS. There seems to be a pretty square conflict of authority there.

Mr. GARNER. Somebody has got to come across with the authority.

Mr. FLOOD. We would like to know the gentleman who is responsible for this.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know, and I do not think my informant is responsible for the situation.

Mr. FLOOD. I called up Mr. Wilbur J. Carr, the director of the Consular Service, on the telephone and told him of the statement the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] made yesterday, and he said there must be some mistake—that payment of salaries under the circumstances stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts was prohibited by law.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. GARD. After the gentleman has made his frank statement does he not think that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] ought to tell us his informant?

Mr. ROGERS. I have no great objection to telling the name of my informant. But what has that to do with it? He is not responsible for the condition there. This is a question of fact.

Mr. GARNER. It is a question of fact, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] says that Mr. Carr, a responsible man in the State Department, says this is not a fact. Now, you assert, as a Member of this House, that you have sufficient information so that you can assert it yourself as a fact.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not assert it as a fact. I say I went to the State Department and consulted the man best qualified to give the information. I simply transmitted to the House that information. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], the chairman of the committee, will call up the Acting Secretary of State or the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Phillips, he can get the information for the House within five minutes. Mr. Carr is a most admirable gentleman, but he is connected with the Consular Service and not primarily with the Diplomatic Service. If I am mistaken, I will apologize to the State Department. I went this morning to the man whom I believed best fitted to advise me and obtained the information from him. Why should I get him in trouble by giving his name?

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. ROGERS. Why should I get that man in trouble?

Mr. GARNER. I think it is the duty of some one to get the facts concerning this matter from the highest authority, probably the Acting Secretary of State, and ascertain the facts in the matter. If these facts are true, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, some one is violating the law. It may be the Auditor for the State Department or some one else whose duty it is to certify that this minister has been absent from his post for more than 60 days. But it is the duty of some one there to certify as to that fact.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. How long will it take the chairman of the committee to get before him the proper officers who have this information and place this information before the House officially.

Mr. FLOOD. As I stated, I called up Mr. Carr.

Mr. DOWELL. But that is not the proper way to get at the facts.

Mr. FLOOD. That is the only way we can get information of this kind quickly; that is, by getting it from some official of the State Department.

Mr. DOWELL. Can not the gentleman call these men before the committee and swear them?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. I called up Mr. Carr, as I said, and told him of the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], and called his attention to his statement and to my statement in reply. He said I was certainly correct as to the law, but that he would have the facts in the Hale case looked up and would send me a statement this afternoon.

Mr. DOWELL. It occurs to me that this is a question of fact that the committee should lay before the House officially and correctly.

Mr. FLOOD. I have made the statement repeatedly as to what the law requires, but the gentleman from Massachusetts did not raise this matter before the committee. The committee were taken entirely by surprise by the gentleman's statement. We heard no suggestion of the matter from him in committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose the gentleman did not possess the information at the time he was in attendance in committee. Has he not the right to expose it in the House? The gentleman from Virginia has called up a gentleman who is not thoroughly versed in the matter, although a very estimable man, but he is not charged with the responsibility for this service.

Mr. FLOOD. I called up a man who is very well versed in these matters.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman from Massachusetts said he got it from a man who is not responsible.

Mr. ROGERS. I did not say that. I said I could not divulge his name and thus possibly get him into serious trouble. If the gentleman will permit, I said I did not know whether my informant was officially required to pass upon the question of salary or not. He is entirely responsible.

The gentleman from Virginia says I "sprang" this matter upon the committee yesterday.

Mr. FLOOD. I did not use that word.

Mr. ROGERS. That was the fair inference to be derived from what the gentleman said. The fact is I had no information on this matter until about a week after the hearings on the measure were completed. If I had had the information at the time the hearings were held I would have raised the question in committee. I had certainly supposed it was perfectly ethical for me to ask the question of the gentleman from Virginia yesterday afternoon in the course of the debate.

Now, one other word. I do not know this Mr. Hale, of North Carolina, but I do know that he is in his eightieth year. He was born in 1839, and, so far as I am informed, he is perfectly well satisfied to stay on indefinitely in North Carolina. He finds the climate of North Carolina much more salubrious than that of San Jose, Costa Rica. I do not want you to think that it is necessary for his protection or pleasure that this House should take action that would send him back to Costa Rica. Mr. Hale was one of the horde of gentlemen whom Mr. Bryan selected as ministers in 1913 and inflicted upon the Latin American Republics. So far as I know, he is a thoroughly estimable gentleman. But he is not a diplomat and never was a diplomat. I question whether he was ever capable of handling adequately the affairs of state in an exceedingly difficult post such as that of Costa Rica.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is not the first time that Mr. Hale has been in the foreign service of the Government, if I am not mistaken. I will not say that I am entirely correct, but I think he was consul to Manchester at one time.

Mr. ROGERS. I understand he was consul at Manchester from 1885 to 1889. He was also——

Mr. POU. I do not say that gives him any peculiar equipment, but——

Mr. ROGERS. He was also, I may say, a Confederate veteran of the Civil War, and I think by trade he is a newspaper man.

Mr. POU. And one of the most estimable men in our State.

Mr. ROGERS. I have absolutely no reflection to make upon his character, but I understand there may be some question as to his diplomatic ability.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman is better versed in these matters than I am, but is there any authority whereby payments of money made under these circumstances may be returned to the Treasury?

Mr. ROGERS. I would rather have the gentleman's judgment, as an eminent lawyer, than mine.

Mr. GARD. I thought perhaps the gentleman would know of it.

Mr. ROGERS. No. I have not looked into that phase of the case.

Mr. STEDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I came in late and have heard some of the remarks just made, but not all of them, concerning Mr. Hale. I deem it my duty to say what I know of Mr. Hale. I have known him all my life, ever since I was a boy. He is one of the most accomplished scholars and ablest men in our State, and has been so regarded always. He was consul to Manchester, England, and won the great approbation of the people of Manchester during Mr. Cleveland's first administration. I think he has never yet held a place of any kind that he has not filled with credit to this country.

Mr. FLOOD. Does the gentleman think his appointment was an infliction on the people of Latin America?

Mr. STEDMAN. No. He is a man of extraordinary ability and estimable character, and is so recognized by everyone who knows him.

Mr. DOWELL. But the question is whether he is in the service or not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEDMAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can the gentleman from North Carolina enlighten us about his age? How old is he?

Mr. STEDMAN. He is about 78. He is one year older than I.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is rather late to start in a diplomatic career, is it not? He is rather old to start in the Diplomatic Service, is he not?

Mr. STEDMAN. He is as well able to perform his duty as my friend is able to perform his duty here, and he has filled with honor every position which he has ever filled.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. STEDMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give the reason why Prof. Hale has not been performing his duties at his assigned post?

Mr. STEDMAN. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question at issue here is why he is receiving the salary as minister to Costa Rica when he has been absent from his post for a year or more, and yet the statute directs that no salary shall be paid to a diplomatic representative when he is absent for more than 60 days.

Mr. STEDMAN. I do not know anything about the facts.

Mr. STAFFORD. No one is questioning the estimable character of the gentleman's constituent. The question at issue is what I have stated.

Mr. STEDMAN. Without knowing anything about the facts, I know that Mr. Hale would not be at home without the consent and approbation of the State Department. He is a man of the highest sense of duty. I do not know anything about the facts of this particular case, but I know the man. I know he is a man of marked ability and of the highest character. I do not know why he is at home. Probably the gentleman can find out from the State Department without any trouble; but I know he is there for some good reason, because I know the man.

Mr. STAFFORD. What the membership would like to know is why he is at home.

Mr. STEDMAN. The gentleman should go to the State Department to find that out.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I intended to bring this matter up again this afternoon when I get the facts fully from the State Department. The gentleman in the State Department with whom I talked had to go to the Senate to appear before the Appropriations Committee there in reference to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. What he told me was that Mr. Hale had not been drawing his salary. I will get the full facts this afternoon, and I would like the gentleman from Massachusetts then to give us the name of his informant in the State Department, if his information is in conflict with that which we will get from Mr. Carr, who is going to make a thorough investigation of it. We will find out why Mr. Hale is at home.

The attitude of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] toward the appointees of the Democratic administration in the diplomatic service is perfectly well known to this House. I have never heard him commend any of them except one, and he is dead. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a very consistent position for the gentleman to take.

Mr. FLOOD. They have rendered as splendid service as any diplomatic corps ever did. The gentleman is a believer in the idea that all of our diplomats, our ministers, and our ambassadors should be appointed from the list of rich secretaries, whom the Republican Party during the administrations of Presidents Roosevelt and Taft were appointed secretaries. We have classified them, but nine-tenths of them have always been Republicans. They were put in there by Republican administrations. They are in there now, and, of course, they are howling to be promoted to positions that half or three-fourths of them are not qualified to fill. I know we have some secretaries in our Diplomatic Service who are worthy to represent this country in the highest diplomatic positions, but there are dozens of them who are unfit ever to represent this country in these important diplomatic positions, and they are the very ones who are constantly trying to have themselves promoted from secretaries to ministers and thence on up to ambassadors. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is one of their most ardent advocates and has been for years; but because he wants to promote his Republican friends I do not see why he should make this ungenerous attack—to say the least of it—upon Maj. Hale, of North Carolina. There are no doubt good reasons why he remained in this country, and I will supply those reasons when I get them from the State Department.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I move to strike out the last two words. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Did we not appropriate the money for some proceedings in Costa Rica two years ago?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Did we not make an appropriation for the legation at Costa Rica?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Has there been anyone there to look after our affairs?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, we have an acting chargé there.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. FLOOD. I am not sure of it, but I think so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to make this further inquiry: Have we officially recognized the present existing government of Costa Rica?

Mr. FLOOD. We have not.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That was my understanding.

Mr. ROGERS. The fact is that we have no diplomatic representation of any kind in Costa Rica, and Costa Rica has no diplomatic representation of any kind in the United States.

Mr. FLOOD. I may be mistaken, but I supposed the secretary would remain there as chargé d'affaires.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If it is a fact that we have no diplomatic representation there, should not Minister Hale have resigned his position long ago? There is really no office for him to fill.

Mr. FLOOD. As I stated yesterday, I have not undertaken to speak with knowledge as to the reasons why Mr. Hale was not in Costa Rica, but my understanding is that it was because our Government had not recognized the existing Government of Costa Rica.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How could a man continue to act as minister to a country when we do not recognize any government in that country?

Mr. FLOOD. We do not recognize the existing Russian Government, and yet the Russians have an ambassador here.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am glad to know that, for there is no more splendid man to represent them, but I think the gentleman will find that the existing Russian Government does not recognize him nor does it do any business through him.

Mr. FLOOD. The Russian Government does not recognize him but our Government does.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is entirely different. We unquestionably find him an individual that we can do business with bearing on the Russian situation and the Russian people, but he in no sense assumes to represent the existing Government of Russia.

Mr. FLOOD. He does not represent the existing Government of Russia, but he represents Russia here and we recognize him.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I question his representing Russia here, but he is one of the most splendid representatives that they could have.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for me to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. If, as stated by the gentleman from Minnesota, there is no government in Costa Rica that we recognize, certainly it would not be necessary to appoint and continue to pay a minister down there supposed to represent our Government.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know the facts in the case. When I get them I will give them to the gentleman, and I am satisfied they will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. GARNER. Of course, if we are so situated in this country that we can not find in the country but one man fit to serve as a minister to Costa Rica, and we must pay him $10,000 a year indefinitely for a term of years to hold a particular place, I agree with the gentleman. But when we do not recognize that country I do not think that it is necessary that he should draw the salary and that we should continue to keep him in cold storage for the purpose of sending him there when we do recognize the government.

Mr. STEDMAN. If the gentleman will yield, we are all talking without knowing the facts. I think if you telephone to Mr. Tumulty he will give you the facts about this Costa Rica business.

Mr. FLOOD. We will undoubtedly find out during the day from the State Department.

Mr. GARNER. We are trying to ascertain the facts.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion, whatever it was. I want to get at this matter, because we are becoming crazy in this country in spending money, and we ought not to be dishing it out at $10,000 a year for some one that is not doing any service. The statement was made on the floor that Mr. Hale, from North Carolina, has been appointed minister to Costa Rica; that he has not been there for two years; that he has been continually drawing a salary although he does no work. Mr. FLOOD read from the statutes where it is positively against the law to pay him a salary if he was 60 days away from his post for any purpose. The statute says "for any purpose." Now, how that can be done I can not understand. Of course Mr. Tumulty, or somebody else, may be able to explain it, but to the ordinary citizen like myself I can not understand why it is necessary to pay a man $10,000 a year to do absolutely nothing in face of the statute which says he can not draw the salary.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true in this instance that there is no position to occupy?

Mr. FLOOD. There is a position to occupy.

Mr. DOWELL. We do not recognize the Government of Costa Rica, therefore there is no position as minister there.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say that as quick as I heard this I went in and tried to get the highest official in the State Department. I got hold of Mr. Phillips. He said he did not know, but he would look the matter up and advise me at the earliest moment, and hoped that he could advise me within 10 minutes. This may be one of other cases that exist of that kind; and if it is, the quicker the House finds it out and the country knows it, the better.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As to the question of fact whether Mr. Hale has been drawing a salary or not, I called up the State Department and heard from Mr. Phillips, who has made an investigation since talking with the gentleman from Texas. He says that Mr. Hale has in fact been drawing his salary up to the 30th of last December, and hence it is presumable that the salary is now going on. Mr. Phillips did not know exactly how long Mr. Hale had been away from his post, but certainly he has been away for more than a year, and during that time he has been drawing the salary in full up to the 1st of the month. That disposes of the question of fact, and if the law is as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, that the salary could not continue for more than 60 days after the minister or diplomatic officer absents himself from the position, then it is a clear violation of the law.

Mr. FLOOD. Absolutely; and the gentlemen who are responsible for it should be exposed and proceeded against.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take more than five minutes of the time devoted to the consideration of this bill, but I have here an official memorandum from the headquarters of the Four hundred and seventy-second Engineers in regard to the discharge of soldiers which, I think, should be called to the attention of Congress. Many Members, I know, have had letters written to them since the armistice by privates, who have told of the threats that were made that they would be considered lacking in duty toward the country in trying to get out of the Army, but it remains for me to receive a statement to that effect in writing and with it a threat that if these men do not continue to perform duties here they will be sent to a less desirable place and further delayed in getting out of the Army.

The privates to whom I refer were engaged in making maps here in the city of Washington in the Coast and Geodetic Survey and were especially engaged of late in the making of a great military map of the United States, which might take years to complete. They undertook to secure their discharges to get back to their jobs, and they furnished affidavits that the jobs were waiting for them, but they are met with a letter such as the one I shall read, and I ask the Members of the House to remember as they hear that letter read that the men were induced to enter the service—the Four hundred and seventy-second Engineers—in response to such alluring posters as that which I hold up, calling for enlistment of surveyors, map men, to reproduce military and aeroplane maps, the presumption being that the work would be done abroad.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Do not fail to call attention to the fact that in the picture the dugouts were adjacent, which shows that they were almost in the presence of the enemy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is the poster, showing a soldier out maping the war country, as we know had to be done in the war zone.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It was in fact done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There were engineers there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The fact that these particular gentlemen to whom my colleague is about to refer did not get there does not differentiate them from thousands and millions of others in the different branches of the service who did not get there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No, sir; of course, not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then, why does the gentleman proceed to bring that poster here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me read the letter, and I know that no Member on either side of the House will do other than join in a demand for an inquiry and possibly a court-martial of the men who authorized and put out this circular letter, which I now read:

HEADQUARTERS FOUR HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SECOND ENGINEERS,
Washington, January 7, 1919.

Memorandum 1.

It has come to the attention of the commanding officer that men of this regiment on various details in Washington, especially those who have requested discharge, are laying down on their work and not "playing the game."

The attention of such men is called to the fact that they have been enlisted in a service which did not require their encountering the dangers and disagreeable features of overseas duty and which practically insured their returning safe and sound to their friends and relatives. Furthermore, details on duty in Washington, D. C., have been receiving commutation of quarters and rations, which has materially augmented their pay. Except for a short period, they have had very little drill, guard duty, and no kitchen police and other disagreeable duties of camp life. Under these circumstances the commanding officer considers that any man who lays down on the job or fails to "play the game" is a mighty poor specimen of a man, and such men are apt to find themselves still in the service but in some much less agreeable location.

This does not mean that applications for discharge will be ignored, but such applications will be thoroughly investigated, and where the cases warrant, discharges will be made. In any event, discharges are being made as rapidly as the completion of the various projects will warrant.

The commanding officer sincerely hopes that the Four hundred and seventy-second Engineers may come to the end of their demobilization with as clean and as brilliant a record as they have carried heretofore.

GUY V. SWEET,
Captain of Engineers.

Now, the charge is this, that these particular men, quite a number of them, were brought from Florida and set to making a military or defense map of the United States, the making of which would take a long period of time; that they presented proper applications for discharge with proper affidavits; that the discharges were denied and were not recommended on the ground that the work had to be done and was important; and that common comment around the office was that certain officers wanted to hold on to their jobs, and therefore held to the necessity of this grand United States defense map making; and the further charge that they got out that circular, which was offensive, and is, in my opinion, an insult to every man who put on the uniform of the United States and did not get overseas, to every man who was kept here in Army work, whether he was a medical officer, a quartermaster's clerk, a potato peeler, or what not. All were working, and working willingly, at whatever task assigned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But when they did apply they knew they were going to make maps?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That part of the first paragraph is only a statement of facts, is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They presumed, and I think most of the men who went into the Army did, that they would be given service overseas, but when they were not given that service they made no complaint but proceeded to do their duty as part of the Four hundred and seventy-second Engineers; but when on the 9th of January of this year, while they were undertaking honestly and rightly to secure discharges from the Army, they were then told that they were lying down on the job and they are threatened, if they do not go on with the map making, they will be sent to a less desirable place, and some of them were actually ordered sent to some place in Florida. I believe that under congressional pressure all have now been discharged; but that circular letter No. 1, by order of the commanding officer, remains, and I think that the commanding officer and others of his kind had better be discharged, and quickly, at that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

For 10 student interpreters in China, who shall be citizens of the United States, and whose duty it shall be to study the Chinese language with a view to supplying interpreters to the legation and consulates in China, at $1,500 each, $15,000: Provided, That the method of selecting said student interpreters shall be nonpartisan: And provided further, That upon receiving such appointment each student interpreter shall sign an agreement to continue in the service as interpreter to the legation and consulates in China so long as his services may be required within a period of five years.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, under that reservation I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question in reference to the policy of the State Department in issuing passports. How long is the war restriction to continue in reference to the issuance of passports?

Mr. FLOOD. I can not answer that question. I believe it will continue as long as the department thinks there is necessity for it here or our friendly Governments request it.

Mr. GARNER. As to what the department is thinking while the head of it is over in Europe I am not prepared to say, but it looks to me whether they are thinking or not they are not functioning. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to refer particularly to the question of issuing passports on the Mexican border, about which I do know something. I do not see anything on the face of the earth which requires the people on the border to send up a dollar to Washington to get a passport to go over 50 miles to some ranch and come back the next day. That has never been done heretofore except in war times. Then it was to prevent the sending of spies into Mexico and getting information. Everything was done to keep them out. But this war is over, and so far as we know there is no reason why everybody in this country could not go to Mexico if they want to go, and I do not see the necessity of continuing this restriction of passports as it is now continued along the Mexican border. I had the pleasure a day or two ago of calling the attention of the Bureau of Passports to it, and it suggested that I write the Secretary. I thought I would ask the gentleman so the RECORD would show, at least, some one was observing the fact that we still desire to do business with Mexico; they are watching the border and continuing unnecessary restrictions.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is directing his inquiry to the situation in Mexico.

Mr. GARNER. Particularly with Mexico, not throughout the country, because I know nothing about that more than any other Member of Congress; but I do know something about things down there, because I get from 10 to 25 letters and telegrams a day to hurry along passports, and I find there has got to be a statement made and it has to be transmitted to the Bureau of Passports and back to the Mexican division, and then I do not know where else, before they can begin to issue a passport.

Mr. FLOOD. I agree with the gentleman, so far as the Mexican situation is concerned, that the time has come to change the policy with reference to passports.

Mr. GARNER. That is all I want to get out of the gentleman, and I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order to get more detailed information as to why the department has difficulty in obtaining applicants to fill the positions of these student interpreters and also to ascertain in reference to support of student interpreters in China and Japan.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman asked if it was difficult to get them. That is the information the committee had.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, when the war was on the young men who were likely to be qualified and desirous of filling these positions went into the war. There was a shortage of labor in clerical positions and in all positions, and I am not surprised that college men have not lately been seeking these positions. If that is the only reason for increasing the salary from $1,000 to $1,500 I think it is something ephemeral.

Mr. FLOOD. It is one reason, you know. The gentleman means the difficulty in getting them at this particular time? It is always difficult to get them at $1,000 salary. It was difficult in the past, and it is more difficult now, and it will be in the future.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the testimony which shows it has been difficult before the war to get these men into the Government service on being paid $1,000 and their expenses paid? What has been received in allowances in addition to the salary of $1,000?

Mr. FLOOD. They received $1,000 and $125 allowed for a teacher for them, which we propose to raise to $150, because it is very difficult to get the tuition for $125 now. Then, there is some allowance for quarters.

Mr. STAFFORD. What do these students have in all? Is this clear salary, and is expense of maintenance and support borne by the Government in these foreign ports?

Mr. FLOOD. We give them enough to support them over there in the Government service, and they get a salary and allowance, and we pay the teachers. Now, Mr. Carr gave a good deal of information on this subject, and he said, on page 77 of the hearings:

Mr. CARR. These positions are now filled; that is, most of them are filled. But the difficulty is we are not getting the type of men we need. We need as high a type of men as we can get in those places, young men from college, and men who, with study, in two or three or four years can develop sufficiently to go out as first-class vice consuls, and a little later take charge of consulates. The kind of men we have been getting in the last three or four years has not been up to the standard or up to the requirements.

The CHAIRMAN. You take them as students?

Mr. CARR. We take them as students and keep them at the legation for two years until they pass an examination in the language, and then send them out to the consulates.

The CHAIRMAN. Then they become interpreters?

Mr. CARR. Then they become interpreters.

The CHAIRMAN. Then they are promoted to vice consuls?

Mr. CARR. Then they are promoted to vice consuls, and ultimately to consuls.

That was the general statement made time and again before the committee, namely, that it is very difficult to get educated young Americans to go there and study these languages at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that it is false economy to place too low a salary for applicants for the Government service if it will keep out a higher grade of men who will ultimately be of more value to the Government service. I was of the impression that young men upon graduation from college would be willing to take up this work at a compensation of $1,000 a year.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think it is the desire to have any boys take it up unless they expect to make this a life work; that is, to become interpreters and vice consuls, and then consuls and consuls general.

Mr. STAFFORD. Believing the Government should seek the very best of our college men, and that perhaps $1,000 is not sufficient entrance salary, I am inclined to withdraw my reservation of the point of order, but if the gentleman has something more to support that position I would be glad to have him give it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLOOD. Here is something more that was said on the subject:

These men of ours have an opportunity for promotion to a reasonable compensation. For instance, we have in China to-day men who have graduated from the student corps, a number of men who are consuls and consuls general, the highest one at the present time being the present consul general at Tientsin, a post which pays $5,500 a year. We have another one at Canton, receiving a salary of $4,500, and others at different places. At Tsingtau we have a man receiving about $4,000, and at Vladivostok one getting $4,000, and at Dairen one receiving $4,000, and all of them are men who began as $1,000 students. Of course, if they were with some commercial company they would probably, in the same length of time, be getting more money. The average offer of the Standard Oil Co. to our men is as a rule from 50 to 100 per cent more than we pay them.

Then I asked him this question:

Yet it is necessary that the corps be maintained?

He replied:

If it is not maintained, then we will have to go back to employing Chinese or Japanese or Armenians, or other natives to do our interpreting, and I do not think it is a safe thing to do. We can not ever expect absolutely to take the place of the native for interpreting work. We can not expect to send men there and have them become so familiar with the language that they will know it as a native knows it and be able to read and write and speak it perfectly. Indeed, such familiarity with the oriental languages is for the most part unnecessary, though desirable. But we must have American officers sufficiently familiar with the language to act as a check upon the local interpreters whom we are bound to employ. There is where the advantage in having these men lies and makes their employment imperative.

Mr. STAFFORD. So I understand, from the reading of the testimony, that this is a school of instruction whereby they qualify not only for interpreters but, which is more important, for the Consular Service in these foreign countries, where it is essential to have a knowledge of the language?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. While I have the floor, and desire to expedite the consideration of the bill, may I inquire what is covered by the provision in lines 4 and 5, where you increase the allowances for payment of the cost of tuition of student interpreters at the rate of $200 per annum each?

Mr. FLOOD. Each student has to have an instructor, and they have been paying an instructor $125 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. One hundred and eighty dollars, I believe, in China, $125 in Japan, and $125 in Turkey.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. In Japan particularly they find it impossible to get them for that sum, and propose to equalize them all and make them $200 a year apiece.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then a tutor to each student will receive $200 a year for the instruction?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order as to the salary increase.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, $48,200.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LAGUARIDA. Can the gentleman inform me how we can possibly recognize the so-called Russian ambassador, Mr. Bakhmeteff, if he represents a government which does not exist?

Mr. FLOOD. We are doing it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then you recognize Mr. Bakhmeteff?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; as the Russian ambassador.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would like to ask the gentleman where Mr. Francis is at this time?

Mr. FLOOD. In London, in a hospital.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How long has he been in the hospital?

Mr. FLOOD. For several weeks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House, and particularly the attention of the gentleman from Virginia and the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to the conditions in Russia concerning our ambassador there. If there is one man in the United States who does not understand, and never did understand, the Russian conditions, it is Mr. Francis. In the performance of his duties there I consider him absolutely hopelessly incompetent.

Mr. FLOOD. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. One minute, please. If the chairman of the committee will take the trouble to read the reports of Mr. North Winship, our consul general at Petrograd, and compare those reports with the reports of Lieut. Commander Crowley he will get the facts. The fact is that this committee is as wholly ignorant of affairs in Russia as is Mr. Francis.

Mr. FLOOD. I am glad the gentleman is in Congress, so that he can enlighten the committee in regard to affairs in Russia.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I appeared before the committee in 1917, and the committee refused to be enlightened, and the committee has not learned anything since.

Mr. FLOOD. Because the committee did not think the gentleman knew anything about what he desired to talk about.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The committee did not know anything about the matter, and were in no position to tell, but the sad feature is that the committee did not wish to be informed.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman thinks he knows it, but I think he will find it hard to get anybody to agree with him on that subject.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think I have the floor.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman must recognize the fact that others, too, accept the gentleman at the value he places upon himself.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman read the series of reports of the consul general at Petrograd?

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman will be really polite enough to let me answer his question, I will try to answer; but I will not engage in such a discussion as this with the gentleman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman read the reports?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Gentlemen should not speak to Members in the House in the second person, as is now being indulged in.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am sorry. Has the gentleman from Virginia read the reports of the American consul general at Petrograd, written in 1917 and 1918?

Mr. FLOOD. No; I have not; but——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Thank you. Now, has the gentleman from Virginia——

Mr. FLOOD. I do not propose to be questioned by you in this way. If you ask for information, I will endeavor to give it to you.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do want information.

Mr. FLOOD. Very well, then. Sit down and I will give it to you.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have the floor.

Mr. FLOOD. Very well. Keep the floor.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, at the most critical time in the affairs of this country, has said that he has not read the reports of our consul general in Russia or from our naval attaché there, and yet he claims that he is enlightened on affairs in that country. He refuses to answer questions and then says that the committee and he, himself in particular, has all the information and nobody else has it. I call the attention of every Member of this House to the reports of Consul General North Winship at Petrograd, and the naval attaché at Petrograd, and ask them to compare those reports with the reports of Mr. Francis. I have wondered if the distinguished gentleman from Virginia is aware of the fact that our allies had to call the attention of the Department of State to the personal conduct and associations of our ambassador with certain of his friends of Teutonic tendencies. Is the gentleman aware of that?

I appeared before this committee in 1917. There I found not only that the committee was not informed on conditions in Russia, but it absolutely refused to listen. I will ask, now, the chairman—the distinguished chairman—if he can stand up and give us the names of the Provinces of Russia and their capitals and their races, or explain recent political changes there? If he can do that now without going to the Library, I will stand up here and most humbly apologize before this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, this is hardly a time to enter into a discussion of Russian affairs. I know that my extremely delightful and accomplished friend from New York is sincere in what he says, but I beg to say that he has not been correctly informed when he says that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has not been giving Russian affairs their attention, because the committee has been given a great deal of light on the situation which recent months have disclosed in Russia. However, by reason of the fact that the war has been the paramount issue with the world for some time, and that the President of the United States is not only the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy but our constitutionally created spokesman in all our foreign affairs, it has not been deemed advisable, in my judgment, and in that of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to take up a discussion of Russian affairs, either publicly or by the committee.

Very likely the time will soon come, and perhaps is now here, when that can properly be done. Personally I have given many months to the study of this question. I am inclined to believe that perhaps I have given more time during the last year and a half to the study of the Russian question than I have given to any other subject during that same period.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I shall be delighted to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I think the question that was asked by our colleague from Pennsylvania on this line was a very pertinent question, because it does involve the duty of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. As I understand from the press dispatches, about $185,000,000 were loaned out of the $375,000,000 that had been promised. That money was not sent to Russia——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that we over on this side can not hear a word that is being said; but there is plenty of room on that side, and I will go over there and sit and listen.

Mr. FESS. I was asking my colleague a question about the disposition of the money that had been loaned to Russia. As I understood, the money was not sent to Russia, but it was used here to purchase munitions when Russia was really an ally, and as soon as the Russian Government broke and Kerensky fell those supplies that had been sent to Vladivostok were taken over by our own authorities, so that even the $185,000,000 that was loaned was not entirely in the hands of the Russian people or the Russian Government.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think myself that the inquiry was entirely pertinent and a very important one. In answer, speaking generally, I think it can be said safely that when the gentleman to whom reference has been made, Mr. Bakhmeteff, was sent here, he was regularly accredited by the then Government, not only de facto but the constitutionally recognized Government of Russia. The Government of Russia at that time had passed beyond the de facto stage in a sense. A revolution had perfected itself and a government stable in character had been formed, Mr. Bakhmeteff was properly accredited to the United States, and as an ambassador, of course, was clothed with the full power to act for that country in the matter of loans and other things. When the Kerensky government fell—if I can use that term—or when the transformation occurred between the Kerensky provisional government and the Soviet government of Russia, chaos naturally resulted at least in the foreign affairs of the Russian Government, and no attempt was ever made by the Soviet government to establish foreign relations with countries generally throughout the world. They did in some instances, but not generally. They never protested against Mr. Bakhmeteff's representation of Russia here. We had received him and recognized him as the proper ambassador from Russia, and we have, in a sense, closed our eyes to the things that have occurred in Russia since then and have continued to recognize him as the existing authority speaking for the Russian people and Russian Government.

This loan to which reference has been made, a very large sum, was intended to pay for supplies purchased in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And while the proper disposition of this fund was taking place, the change which I have referred to occurred between the Kerensky government and the Soviet. Manifestly somebody had to act and did act, and I understand Mr. Bakhmeteff has continued to represent the Russian people. Whether or not the payment of the interest charges on that loan out of the principal is proper is a question of law and not of politics.

Mr. FESS. Is the gentleman informed as to the law on that?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, I have an opinion on that subject, but I would not want to express it here.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to know if my colleague felt free to state what the status of that debt is now, with the Russian Government in the situation in which it finds itself?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course we do not recognize any existing government of Russia at the present time. If the gentleman cares for my personal opinion it is this, that that debt is a debt owed by the Russian people, and we do not care whether they have a Czar, a Kerensky, a Soviet, a President, or a Mikado.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman means that it does not make any difference so far as the payment of this loan is concerned?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; they may have any kind of government they want, and though we Americans may prefer that they enjoy one kind of government rather than another, that which concerns us here is that this debt is owed by the Russian people, and they have got to pay it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman said he did not care. He means that it does not make any difference.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It does not make any difference as far as the payment of this debt is concerned. They have a right to choose their own form of government, but I am speaking of the repayment of the money that we loaned for the service of the Russian people.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What evidence of indebtedness have we from the Russian Government or the Russian people?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not in a position to answer the gentleman's inquiry authoritatively, but I am quite confident that the Russian ambassador has given due receipts for the sums loaned and has full authority to perform such an act by reason of his position.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Were there any formal instruments issued, bonds or any evidences of that character?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am certainly of the opinion that there must have been. The gentleman will recall that some of these loans were made to the old Russian Government when the Czar was on his throne, and the business transaction was carried on by the first Mr. Bakhmeteff, who was ambassador under the régime of the Czar.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I had something else I wanted to say.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I was only going to suggest to the gentleman that the handling of these loans was not in the Department of State, nor does this matter come within the purview of this particular committee to know the full details of it. The loans were made by the Secretary of the Treasury under the powers given by this immediate Congress, and the full information can be obtained from the proper committee, it seems to me, or from the Treasury Department, much more readily than from the State Department, and they are expected to know about it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman's position is well taken in one sense, but in another sense loans from one Government to another are an international matter, having a political significance, and as such come under the jurisdiction of the State Department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Minnesota permit an interruption?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think it is well within the recollection of all gentlemen on the floor who listened to the debate here shortly after Mr. Bakhmeteff came as representative of the Kerensky government that about $185,000,000 was loaned to that government through him. While the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was addressing the House concerning testimony recently given by Secretary McAdoo before the Committee on Appropriations, I asked him specifically what the security was that had been given by Ambassador Bakhmeteff as representative of the Kerensky government for the money that was loaned to Russia by our Government. I asked him in so many words if a bond or any bonds were given. He said no, but what was the equivalent of a demand note signed by Mr. Bakhmeteff, as ambassador representing the Kerensky government, but that nothing in the form of a bond, as I understood it, had been given.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is precisely what every Government gave. We have no bond for security; they are merely notes of hand made by the proper representatives. So that so far as that is concerned the situation is the same in regard to Great Britain and other countries.

The time of Mr. MILLER of Minnesota having expired, he was given five minutes more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it not true—at least it was so said on the floor by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in his remarks—that the law authorizing the loaning of this money to the belligerent Governments required these respective Governments to give as security bonds containing substantially the same provisions as were contained in the bonds of the United States Government?

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, that was true in regard to the first loan, the 3½ per cent. That was the requirement, but in subsequent loans it was authorized and not required. The Treasury Department could do it if it saw fit, but as a matter of fact no bonds have been received from any of the foreign Governments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Under which law of authorization were these loans made to Russia, to the Kerensky government?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I imagine it was the first.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think there is some confusion here. When the war broke out with Russia there were certain loans floated in this country for Russia through the banks in New York City. These loans were sold to the investing public. What I want to know is whether the subsequent loan made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the new Kerensky government—whether that money was used for the purpose of paying interest on the debt that otherwise would have been defaulted.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I know personally nothing about it, and I can not definitely answer the gentleman's question, but I understand that the principal of the one hundred and eighty-five millions, so called, is being used to pay that interest, but, of course, it is a legal question whether that is proper or not.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I think we can agree that the position of the present Russian ambassador is anomalous and an exceedingly embarrassing one. I suppose he can get no money from Russia, even if the people desired to send it to him. Does the gentleman know whether, in fact, the United States Government pays him for his personal support?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can not speak personally, but my information is that he has subject to his disposal one hundred and eighty-five millions, and that he can provide for his own expenses.

Mr. ROGERS. He can go into the Treasury Department on any morning and say he wants $1,000 out of his balance?

Mr. RAGSDALE. If the gentleman will permit, the recognition of any foreign ambassador is an executive function. No committee of the House can interfere with it. The sums of money that have been loaned through the Secretary of the Treasury to the foreign governments are entirely controlled by the President of the United States, under the legislation of Congress, and with which no committee can interfere.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use these seven minutes speaking somewhat briefly and in general terms only of the Russian situation, and this has been induced by the remarks made by my good friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct in the suggestion thrown out in his remarks that our diplomatic representation in Russia during at least a year and a half has not been of the most successful character. I say that as I judge of the work that has been done by the American representatives in Russia.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is it that Gov. Francis did, or failed to do, that you gentlemen are trying to make capital out of?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the Speaker will permit, I was about to come to that point, and, while I do not care to enter into a full discussion of it, I think the honored Speaker of the House will understand my position from what I say. I was about to express this sentiment when interrupted: In respect of this character of representation America does not stand unique among the other nations of the earth. No one can study the diplomatic history of the great Russian people during the past two years and come out of it without knowing that the action of all of the allies, including the United States itself, was just one stupendous blunder after another. In my opinion there does not exist in the history of diplomacy in this century two periods and two places where greater blunders, with more far-reaching consequences, occurred than in Greece and Russia, and in Russia is the worst of the two.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit, Ambassador Francis did not have anything to do with Greece.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, I am not criticizing the American ambassador to Russia for anything in Greece.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, what was it that happened in Russia?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will possess my soul in patience.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. To quote the gentleman's own estimable language, I will try to enlighten him. I feel embarrassment in speaking too plainly and at all in detail, and I am not going to do it, but I will say this: Mr. Francis, when he landed in Russia, by the associations he made, and they were all innocently formed, and he is perhaps to be forgiven for having made them, was not in a position to be warmly received by the Russian people, who presently took matters into their own hands. He not only had a complete lack of an understanding of the Russian character, and I now speak of the masses of Russian people, but he did not make any effort to understand their character, learn their aspirations, or to cooperate with their democratic movements. Perhaps very likely the environment of our ambassador handicapped him as it did his associates from other countries in this regard. I desire not at this time to enter into a discussion one way or another of the work of Mr. Francis in Russia and simply submit these most general observations.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How does the gentleman know all this? And then I would like to ask another question while I am at it. Did not the Hon. Elihu Root come back from over there from that celebrated expedition he made and claim in a public speech that there was no more trouble in Russia than there was in the United States?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, I am not certain Elihu Root ever made that statement.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I am, if the gentleman is not.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like further to inquire what has ever been done with the report that Elihu Root made? Nobody outside the executive department has ever seen it or heard of it, and nobody has had a chance to know what it is. Now, if the gentleman will permit, as I can proceed only for a very few minutes, I do not care to enter into anything of a partisan character at all in this, because it is a matter that affects our country as a whole. The fault of the diplomats representing the United States and allied nations in Russia during this terrific period has been this: They have failed to see that the 7 per cent of Russian people heretofore constituting the aristocracy and the governing class, in possession of the land and of wealth and brains, education, culture, and refinement, have ceased to exist, and that the 93 per cent of people who heretofore had never known or found the blessings and privileges of political and economical freedom are now masters of their own fate and should be dealt with as the Russian nation. These diplomatic representatives have clung and are willing to cling to the old wrecked and sinking group of survivors, if you please, of the Czar's régime, and fail to see that the power and blood of Russia is in the masses of Russian people, and until our diplomatic representatives go and meet those people and forget the Czar and his associates and the aristocracy, we will never get on speaking terms and working terms with the Russian people. So I hope it will be understood that I have no special criticism of Mr. Francis, apart from the other diplomatic representatives, for his entire failure to accomplish certain results for which he was sent to labor. But this undoubtedly is true. When Mr. Francis landed in Petrograd he permitted himself to be isolated from the entire Russian situation. I do not like to say that he was filled with fear, I do not like to say that he was filled with hopelessness as to accomplishing anything with the Russian people, but I will say that from the time chaos started at Petrograd——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I have five minutes additional?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He might as well have been on the Island of Malta. Perhaps this is no fault of his and may be the fault of the situation. It is necessary that we send to Russia some man of strength with the masses of the Russian people, some man who will make a sympathetic effort to cooperate with democracy there, if we are going to accomplish results. Now, I had prepared some months ago——

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. After a great deal of work a rather elaborate address on the Russian situation. I will yield for a brief interruption.

Mr. LAZARO. Does that mean the Bolsheviki?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; now, the gentleman probably knows about what I think of the Bolsheviki, and what I ought to think of them anyhow.

Mr. LAZARO. What does the gentleman mean by "masses"?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If I had an hour I could certainly express myself fully, but I do not feel disposed to take the time of the committee in such full discussion. I would like to say this, however: Every man conversant with the true condition in Russia knows that the millions there are determined on democracy, and our attitude should be one of sympathy and helpfulness. At the same time I have no sympathy whatever with Lenine, Trotzky, or their Bolsheviki insanity. They are betraying their people by their foolish dreams and cruel methods.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. All right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman has no sympathy with them, who are you going to have sympathy with over there—who is running it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That, I think, is a pertinent question. In answer to the gentleman I would say this, and I hope I can make my thought clear: There are two great extremes in Russian thought and life in recent times. There is the old aristocracy that is no more, and we all have kissed it goodby with a smile on our lips. There is the new and the present Bolsheviki government in Russia; that is the opposite extreme. It is the final refuge of the mass of mankind, ignorant and improperly led, who are walking to their own destruction. Nothing can justify the conduct of Lenine and Trotzky in their administration of affairs in Russia. But this is true: The great masses of the Russian people when they overthrew the Czar wanted to be fair-minded, to be just, wanted to progress, wanted to be free, wanted to establish a real democracy. They were ignorant and have been misled. I fear the nations of the world did not look upon this great struggling mass of mankind with that sympathetic care they should have done. Foreign diplomats then had been too long accustomed to deal with the old aristocracy to readily take up with the new order of things. Many of them still clung to the hope that somehow out of the chaos the old discarded aristocracy could get back to power. They failed to make the best of the situation, work with this democracy, and endeavor to lead it along a safe pathway. In effect, at least, they abandoned the newly released Russian masses to the radicals and those who cruelly misled them. They left these throngs of people to the vicious German propaganda and to the leadership of extreme radicals. The present deplorable condition of the Russian people, the hundreds of millions that are there, can be charged, first, to their own ignorance; second, to their folly; third, because the civilized nations of the world left them to wallow in the slough of despond.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think that we all use the term "Bolshevism" rather loosely; but if it is what I conceive it to mean, it consists of a number of people who are organized for the purpose of establishing chaos. If we consider it in that light, what portion of the Russian people to-day, would the gentleman say, are really active Bolshevists?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A very small per cent.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Is there a middle class in Russia, in the gentleman's judgment?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Not as we understand the middle class in any other place in the world. The Kerensky government, had it been permitted to continue, in my judgment, would have so changed its character that it would have become a meeting ground of the best elements of the two sides and would have formed the middle class that would have solved the situation, but he made some very vital mistakes, and, of course, the unfortunate propaganda of Germany at that time finished the job. Kerensky sought to keep faith with Russia's allies by restoring the Russian Army to a fighting force. He began this, perhaps, too late. At all events, his efforts to restore discipline resulted in disaster.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. POU. The gentleman has spoken of Trotsky. I suppose also he has in mind one Lenine.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I also spoke of him.

Mr. POU. Men can not lead unless other men follow, and, so far as I can judge, we are dealing with a race of people who have followed a set of traitors, and for my part I am opposed to sacrificing a single American boy there.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I indorse exactly the sentiment that we should not sacrifice a single other American boy on Russian soil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express this with the strongest conviction of which I am capable: When the aristocracy of Russia was overthrown, nearly two years ago, the mass of the Russian people, as all the world knows, were untutored in politics and political self-government. There had been scattered over the world refugees from Russia, there were thousands in Siberia, there for political crimes. They were not a bad kind at all. They were usually the kind that we in this country have felt a profound sympathy for; but there were Russians in other nations of the world, men who were pure anarchists, who had by their conduct elsewhere in the world drifted entirely away from the sanctity of organized society, away and apart from the real principles of civilization. Among these two Trotsky and Lenine may both be numbered. Lenine was exiled in Switzerland and Trotsky in the United States. Trotsky was identified with ultraradicals in the United States. I am advised that as soon as the world knew of the revolution in Russia these men poured back into Russia from the corners of the earth. More than 100,000 came from distant parts of the earth. These men could speak of other civilizations in a glib and flowing tongue. These men could talk that they had lived in America and knew the American free institutions. They could say they had lived in free Switzerland, that they had lived in republican France, and, therefore, they set themselves up as leaders of the people. The people, gullible in the extreme, were seduced from the pathway of true democracy and led toward crime and disaster. This is the reason, in my judgment, why the masses of the people have been led astray. Russia will in the end achieve her democratic ideals, but the way has been made long and hard by the failure of the allies to save her from her foes within.

Even when Lenine and Trotsky captured the Russian control we should have tried our best to keep up relations with the Russian people, never ceased our efforts to help them to a better condition. Proper work of America and the allies, I feel sure, would have saved Russia from the awful state into which she has fallen.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It came to me from a very high source that the Root Commission had recommended the expenditure of a very large sum of money, specified at $5,000,000, to enter upon an intelligent propaganda in Russia to avoid the danger that Mr. Root himself had announced might appear. I have understood that one member of the commission refused to sign that recommendation. What has become of those recommendations to which the gentleman referred awhile ago without specifying?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not know what has become of them. I should be very glad to answer if I did. In conclusion I would like to indorse the sentiment expressed by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. POU]. I do not believe that we are justified in keeping an American soldier in Russia or Siberia another day, and yet I believe the President did the wise thing when he sent them there at the time. I believe he did the wise thing for many reasons, and I heartily approved of his plan at the time. He was justified in taking that course by reason of international complications of the most stupendous character. I know from what I can gather that he resisted the strongest kind of pressure from some nations in the world to send in there a very large force. To have done this would have been unjustifiable from any decent standpoint. Nothing could justify our entering a world war to save democracy and at the same time sending our boys into Russia to shoot democracy out of the Russian people. There were reasons justifying the sending of a few troops there at that time. It was a dangerously delicate situation, and before a man was sent the masses, the people, should have known that the coming of our soldiers contained no menace to their democracy.

In my judgment the one great impelling reason for sending in our men was that within the confines of the Russian Empire were the Czecho-Slovaks, whose deeds during the last year and a half form a page in heroism, sacrifice, and suffering that has no parallel since men marched under the crusaders' cross to the Holy Land. And I was in favor of sending those men to Russia, although I knew it was fraught with danger to our relations with the Russian people. I wanted those men to go that we might aid those Czecho-Slovaks, whom money could not buy nor threats frighten, heroic souls who crossed desert lands and frozen steppes, forests, and icy streams, starved, naked, bleeding, and dying, that they might again have liberty for their country. And he whose eye stretches back through the centuries to 1648, when their country lost its liberty, can well say in his heart that their country may have lost its independence but their people never lost their heroic spirit, and while they live it is the duty of Americans, who love freedom and liberty, to help them at any cost. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. After listening to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and being told what the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] said I think the best thing to do would be to constitute them the entire peace congress at Paris and let them settle this thing right off the bat themselves. [Applause.]

I hold no brief for Ambassador David Rowland Francis. These gentlemen bring general, nebulous charges against him. They should be more specific. What did he do that the representatives of other great powers did not do or what did he fail to do that the representatives of these other great powers failed not to do? The truth is that there is not a man on earth who knows really what is going on in Russia. With 180,000,000 people, divided into about 30 or 35 or 40 nationalities, each one of them at the other's throats, all that those ambassadors over there, Francis among them, could do was to take care of their own people as well as they could.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] suggests that Gov. Francis ought to have gone on an electioneering campaign in order to have gotten acquainted with the Russian people. Would he not have been in a beautiful condition had he undertaken a thing like that? It is the law of the world, the international law or custom, that representatives of a country in other countries shall attend to their own business and not mix up with other people's affairs. President Cleveland sent an English ambassador back from here for doing that identical thing. George Washington sent a Frenchman home because he persisted in doing it; President Wilson did the same; and the public opinion of the United States has indorsed all three of them in what they did. I have no sort of doubt that others have departed from our shores upon private intimations to their Governments that they were persona non grata here.

I am going to tell you just a little about Francis; not much. The gentleman intimated that maybe Francis was afraid. Let me tell you something. A man born in Kentucky and raised in Missouri is not afraid of the devil himself. [Applause.] He started in as a clerk in a St. Louis commission house when he was a boy. He got to be the biggest commission merchant in St. Louis. He was made mayor of that great city. He was elected governor of that imperial Commonwealth. He was a member of Cleveland's Cabinet. And there is not a man living who can assert that in any of those high positions he ever failed to do his duty and his whole duty. [Applause.]

He is a man of splendid capacity and high character. While I do not know what he did in Russia, and neither does the gentleman from Minnesota nor the gentleman from New York, it is to be presumed that a man with that kind of record would do what he ought to do. Whether he is a skillful diplomat I do not know. Not being much of a diplomat, I do not profess to be a judge of diplomats. I will, however, state that Ambassador Francis has as much common sense as any other man in the Diplomatic Service. My own opinion is that if Kerensky had called a constituent assembly as soon as he got in power over there they might have a settled government at this time. But he did nothing of the sort. That Russia will some day have a free and stable government we all hope and pray. The road, however, to freedom is long and tortuous; more is the pity. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is a man a good deal above the average intelligence, even in the House of Representatives, and he ought to know, and he does know, that France, starting out under almost exactly the same circumstances as Russia, took almost a hundred years to gain a settled government.

In 1789 they had a Bourbon King, and they chopped his head off. Then they had a committee of safety, which they soon kicked out. Then came the Reign of Terror—Robespierre and his bloody gang. Then they had a directory. Then came Napoleon, with his consulate and empire for 15 years. The Bourbons then came back and stayed until 1830, lacking 100 days of the Waterloo campaign. Then Louis Philippe was inducted into office. He stayed 18 years. The second Republic was established; Louis Napoleon was elected President, and stabbed it to death in the house of its friends. Then came the second Empire for 18 years. After that they had the Commune for some months. Then they established the third Republic, which, thank God, seems to be founded on a rock. [Applause.] I would not be at all surprised if Russia goes through as long a revolutionary period as that. An established free government will be worth all it costs in blood, life, and treasure, if the revolution does go on for a hundred years. Of course, we hope their revolutionary period will be shorter.

I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from New York that they could be in a great deal better business than backcapping the American ambassador to Russia. [Applause]. Suppose that he was to take their criticisms to heart and resign—which he will not do, if he has half as much sense as I think he has—but suppose he did, and President Wilson wanted to send another ambassador to Russia, to what Government would he accredit him? You have to have a government to which to accredit an ambassador or a minister, and they have none in Russia, except the one that Trotsky and Lenine have established, which is bitterly opposed. They may take it into their heads, so far as I know, those two remarkable men, to really make a republic over there. It can not be done in a day.

The governor of Missouri offered the Senatorship to Gov. Francis. He could not accept it because of the fact that if he resigned there was nobody to accredit an ambassador to.

Then Gov. Gardner offered it to me, and I stayed here with you gentlemen because of the love that this House manifested to me time and time again, and which I fully reciprocate. [Applause.]

I am in favor of bringing every American soldier out of Russia. [Applause.] I will tell you what else I am in favor of. I am in favor of bringing every American soldier out of Europe. [Applause.]

A few weeks ago Gen. du Pont, who made more money selling powder for this war than you could stack up in this room in $1 bills, gave out an interview in New York, in which he said we would have to keep our soldiers over there for two years; one year to tear down the barbed-wire fences and entanglements. We did not put up those barbed-wire fences and entanglements over there, and if the Belgians and French do not want those barbed-wire fences to stay up they will not let them stay up. They are not going to let them stay up, because the metal in those fences is worth millions of dollars, and my observation is that a Belgian or Frenchman never lets a good coin escape him if he can grab hold of it.

Somebody else suggests that we ought to keep them over there to police Europe. After we defeated the Germans for them, they surely ought to police Europe themselves, because there is no doubt but that the sending of our Army over there was what gave them the victory. I was willing for my boy, as every man in this House was for his, to go over there and help them fight, but I am not willing to have my boy stay and have his life work interfered with to tear down wire fences or be a policeman. [Applause.] Among the many wise things President Wilson has said in Europe, the most sensible thing, according to my judgment, is that he intimated to those people over there a week or two ago that he was going to bring those soldiers there back home.

So far as the American ambassador is concerned, I will stand by him, because he has been accredited over there by the chief of Americans now living, and I think gentlemen would naturally praise our American representatives abroad.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If I can get time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Did the gentleman gather that I was making any criticism of Mr. Francis or other ambassadors abroad?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know what you were doing if you did not do that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I was trying to avoid it, and if I did not avoid it, it was because it is impossible to speak of him and still avoid it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman ought to give specifications. I think Francis, like every other man on earth, ought to answer for his duties.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that I tried my best to express in general terms my own personal views, based on such personal information as I could get, and I will say to the gentleman that I got a whole lot of it in Europe and some of it here, in general terms, such as would not subject Mr. Francis to personal criticism, and if the gentleman thinks I have criticized Mr. Francis he is at liberty to do so, but I assure him that I tried my level best to speak of the Russian situation so that no personal criticism could be made to apply to Mr. Francis or our ambassadors.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask you this question: How did you get it into your head that you knew what would happen over there in those countries more than those ambassadors did? [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, that is a very pertinent question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But that is not anything that I ever had in my head.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You talked that way.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I may have differed with them with respect to their work and the propriety of the work that was done there, but I never assumed to say that I knew more about the situation in Russia than the ambassadors of foreign Governments there. But I think that the viewpoint that I secured from the information that was given me was better than their viewpoint, and it is the viewpoint now held, including that of those ambassadors themselves.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear these gentlemen all the time, but when are we going to get down to business and pass the appropriation bills?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. WINGO. Has not the gentleman already spoken on this Russian business?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I did make the criticism that the distinguished Speaker referred to.

Mr. WINGO. I think we ought to get down to business, but I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, it was I who made the criticism of Mr. Francis, and I think I owe it to the distinguished Speaker to give the specifications and particulars he requests. Now, if Mr. Francis was born in Kentucky and raised in Missouri and is fearless, I was born in New York and was raised in Arizona, and I am not afraid to answer. [Applause.]

I do not agree with the distinguished Speaker that Mr. Francis did as much or as little as the diplomatic representatives of the allied countries. My first point to the bill of particulars is this, that Mr. Francis did not work in accord and in sympathy and in harmony with the diplomatic representatives of France and England, and did not cooperate with them. He did not even advise with them judging from his action. All of that is a matter of record in the State Department.

My point No. 2 on Mr. Francis is this, that Mr. Francis in the beginning was not in sympathy with the revolution in Russia, and when the revolution did take place and there was a de facto government established, Mr. Francis did not familiarize himself with the conditions in Russia, and his reports to the State Department will bear me out that he did not have accurate information. The distinguished Speaker says neither did anybody else. Yes; the answer is the British and French ambassadors advised their Governments correctly and so did our consul general at Petrograd, North Winship, and our naval attaché at Petrograd, Lieut. Commander Crowley. They reported to the State Department and to the Navy Department, and their reports are a matter of record. Both of those gentlemen, I will say to the distinguished Speaker, informed this Government that Kerensky could not hold the Government. They knew he was misleading our ambassador. They knew he was not sincere in his effort to keep the army in fighting condition at the front. Kerensky was weak and did not have the courage of his convictions, and they knew he was going to play into the hands of the mob.

We would have no business interfering with the internal affairs of Russia under normal conditions, as the distinguished gentleman from Missouri stated. At that time, however, we were engaged in war, and we had an interest in keeping the eastern front intact, and both Winship and Crowley informed our Government that the eastern line would break, and that we would lose the entire eastern front, thereby releasing 50 or 60 divisions of German and Austrian soldiers to be used at the other fronts, if Kerensky continued unchecked in power. You all remember that shortly after Kerensky took possession, or was in power, there was a conflict within the Russian Government as to abolishing the death penalty for desertion. That was the first break in the Kerensky government. One faction claimed that with the establishment of the republic only such soldiers should serve as wanted to stay at the front, and that all punishments for desertion should be abolished. Now, any man could see that no Russian soldier was going to stay on the eastern front unless he had to.

Kerensky at first opposed this. He was, as you will recall, the minister of war. After his inspection at the front, when, as you will also remember, he fraternized with the soldiers, entirely ignoring commands and the officers, encouraging the formation of company and regimental committees, he returned to Petrograd with new ideas. He then lined up in favor of the abolition of the death penalty for desertion. France and England seem to have known this from their ambassadors. Our consul general at Petrograd and our naval attaché knew it, and they reported it. You will find, gentlemen, that our ambassador failed entirely to report actual existing conditions on this point. You will all recall the anxious moments in Russia pending the decision of this vital question. Gen. Korniloff was opposed to Kerensky and did everything within reason to convince Kerensky that everything would crumble unless the army was maintained and the eastern front held. It became a fight between Kerensky and Korniloff. France and England backed Korniloff, because Korniloff would have kept the army on the eastern front, but, I am informed, on Mr. Francis's report to the Department of State we backed Kerensky and backed the wrong horse. Not only did we do that, I will say to the distinguished Speaker, but we brought pressure to bear upon our allies, and they were guided by our judgment.

The distinguished Speaker of this House spoke about the Root Commission. The Root Commission did not have full information. They were in Russia for only a few weeks. They could not grasp the situation in that time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why did they not get it? That is what they were sent over there for.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I personally do not consider the work of that commission a howling success. They spent two weeks in getting from Vladivostok to Petrograd. Take that out of the time that they were away and you will see that they did not have the opportunity to carefully observe conditions or carefully size up men. Was that not the duty of our ambassador? Should he not have intimate knowledge of the various men then in power? If Mr. Francis had worked in harmony and cooperated with his colleagues, the British and French ambassadors, or if he had been willing to listen to his own subordinates, Consul General Winship and Commander Crowley—two keen, bright, able, energetic Americans—he would not have permitted the Root Commission to see but one side of the picture. I believe Kerensky fooled Mr. Root and the whole commission, the same as he did Mr. Francis himself. Why, to give you an idea, in order to get a "Socialist" audience for the Socialist representative of the commission, Mr. Russell, I am told that Mrs. Pankhurst got up a meeting of servant girls working in families of the Petrograd aristocracy who were brought to the ballroom of one of the fashionable hotels by their mistresses to listen to Mr. Russell's lecture. They knew no English; he knew no Russian. If this is a sample of the direct contact and communication with the people of Russia can you imagine what sort of information must be filed in the archives of the American Embassy in Russia?

Mr. IGOE. Whom did Mr. Root address when he was over there?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Who was it that gave this information to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. North Winship, our consul general to Russia, and Commander Crowley.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman tell us where they gave him that information?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly. After North Winship put in these reports Mr. Francis said, "I don't want this man here," and he was recalled.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Which man?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. North Winship.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Where did they inform the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am coming to that. Commander Crowley was recalled. I saw North Winship at Milan, Italy. He is our consul there now, and I saw Commander Crowley at Madrid, Spain. He is our naval attaché there, and I personally interviewed him on the subject.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit a further interruption?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Anything.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Did the gentleman at that time advise the State Department of the information he had and as to the very poor handling of our foreign affairs in Russia?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why, certainly not. It was too late then. Everything was over as far as the front went. Our good men had been recalled. I had all I could do holding down the job I then had on my hands. Past experience had taught me that the Department of State did not desire information of that kind. The reports I referred to were all sent to the department.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. As I understood the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] he thought this Government failed in not upholding Kerensky.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. There seems to be a difference of opinion between the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not go into the details of that with the gentleman. Perhaps he misunderstood the gentleman from Minnesota.

Why, gentlemen, these very conflicts of opinion, all this lack of information, is proof positive that this House is not in possession of the facts, and from what source are this House and other departments of our Government to get information if not from our diplomatic representatives abroad? This Mr. Francis failed to do.

I agree with what has been said on the floor to-day and repeated many times during the past weeks that our Army should return home. We have accomplished our task. I am glad to hear that the distinguished Speaker says that they will soon all be on their way back. I hope that no time will be lost in getting all of our troops out of Russia. No matter how careful or tactful we may be in our conduct of these troops in Russia, we are bound to get mixed up in the factional fights now going on in that unhappy country. Even in endeavoring to preserve order, are we not liable to play into the hands of one of the factions? And would it not be most embarrassing to us and our purpose in this war and our ideals if in the course of preserving order in absolute good faith we were to indirectly assist in the Romanoff dynasty or other undesirable dynasty again placing itself in possession of Russia and her people? [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] criticizes the Committee on Foreign Affairs for not hearing him on the Russian question, and he intimates that they do not know much about the Russian situation. I do not care to discuss that situation to-day. The distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] is a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. He has demonstrated to this House certainly that some members of the committee are familiar with the Russian situation, whether their conclusions in reference to that situation are correct or not. The other members of that committee are sufficiently well posted on Russian affairs not to desire to hear the gentleman from New York.

But I do want to say this in reference to the statement made here and the intimations thrown out about our ambassador to Russia. I had a talk with the Assistant Secretary of State sometime ago in reference to this gentleman. I had heard these rumors which have been hinted at to-day as to the delinquencies of Ambassador Francis, and I took up the matter with the Assistant Secretary of State, whose business it is to keep posted on these matters and who had these consular reports before him, who was fully aware of everything that was said in the consular reports referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who had all the rumors brought here by people who had traveled in Russia and those who had not traveled in Russia about Ambassador Francis, and he said this: That Ambassador Francis was one of the most efficient diplomatic representatives we had in the service [applause], and the very strongest intellect and character in the diplomatic service in Russia during this period of unrest. [Applause.] He said that Ambassador Francis was the one man around whom all the other representatives of the allied powers gathered for advice and for strength, and that he was the most active diplomatic representative in Russia; that he was everywhere that one man could possibly be as long as his health held out. But when his health broke down his little home was the place at which the other representatives in Russia from the nations with whom we had been associated in the war gathered for advice and support. The only criticism that he ever heard made against Mr. Francis that was supported by investigation made by the State Department was that when he first went to Russia he did not live in the magnificent style that the Russian people and the nobility desired him to live in; that he traveled around Petrograd in a Ford car instead of a Pierce-Arrow, and lived in moderate quarters, quarters that did not appeal to the wealthy people of Russia, and they criticized him for that, because he did not keep up the style they expected and desired him to. That was the only criticism by people who really know Russia and the Russian situation. I wanted to say this in defense of a man who has made great sacrifices for his country and for civilization. [Applause.]

To enable the President to provide, at the public expense, all such stationery, blanks, records, and other books, seals, presses, flags, and signs as he shall think necessary for the several embassies and legations in the transaction of their business, and also for rent, repairs, postage, telegrams, furniture, typewriters, including exchange of same, messenger service, compensation of kavasses, guards, dragomans, and porters, including compensation of interpreters, and the compensation of dispatch agents at London, New York, San Francisco, and New Orleans, and for traveling and miscellaneous expenses of embassies and legations, and for printing in the Department of State, and for loss on bills of exchange to and from embassies and legations, and payment in advance of subscriptions for newspapers (foreign and domestic) under this appropriation is hereby authorized, $1,300,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have scanned very closely the usually illuminating report of the committee on this bill, and under this item I find this information: Appropriation for 1919, $1,105,585; estimate for 1920, $1,200,000; amount recommended, $1,300,000. Here is quite an unusual increase that has no explanation except the bare figures as carried in the appropriation bill or in the estimates on this bill. I rise in all seriousness of purpose to ascertain the reason why the committee granted $100,000 more than the estimate, and the bill carrying nearly $300,000 more than the current appropriation.

Mr. FLOOD. The committee did add $100,000 to this item.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me say that the report states it as $1,105,000.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; the report embraces the deficiency; that is, the Diplomatic and Consular bill carried $1,005,000. The Appropriations Committee, in a deficiency bill, added another $100,000, making $1,105,000. The State Department asked that that be increased to $1,200,000, because there would be an increase in the telegraph service caused by the greatly increased business that would come after the final settlement at the peace table.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I notice in the hearings that the sum expended last year out of this appropriation was $700,000 for cable tolls. Is it not a fact that during the next year, on account of the great activity of that line of work, a greater sum will be needed?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman anticipate that during the fiscal year beginning July 1 there will be such activity in the use of the cable as would require a larger appropriation?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; more in the State Department.

Mr. ROGERS. In the hearings, Mr. Carr—page 82—states that the total appropriation for 1918 was $1,180,000; was that a slight error?

Mr. FLOOD. No; $1,105,000 is correct.

Mr. ROGERS. So that the appropriation asked for is an increase——

Mr. STAFFORD. The appropriation for 1919 is $1,105,585——

Mr. ROGERS. I am referring to 1918. The recommendation in this bill contains, as the gentleman will observe, only a very small increase over that appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I direct the gentleman's attention, because he has called attention minutely to these appropriations, that there was only expended in 1918, regardless of the appropriation, $1,034,000. That was last year, ending June 30 last. So we are appropriating nearly $300,000 for the expense of this service for the next fiscal year over what was expended in the last fiscal year, a very considerable increase.

Mr. FLOOD. What I was going on to say was that the State Department is not responsible for all of this increase. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, without any suggestion from the State Department, did add $100,000 to it. The opinion from the State Department was that the telegraphic service during the year 1920, owing to the creation of new countries, the establishment of new embassies and legations, would be probably greater than it had ever been before, and therefore they asked for a small amount more than they got for the current year from our committee and the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Foreign Affairs went further and added $100,000. A hundred thousand dollars was added in order that it might be applied to rent. The gentleman will observe that some of the money can be used where necessary for rent, and we thought it was wise to aid our representatives in the most expensive capitals with an allowance for rent, or, rather, to make an appropriation that would enable the State Department to do so. The committee really had in mind that the department might supply some of these ambassadors at these high-priced places with means with which to rent dwellings. That may not meet with the gentleman's approval, but that is what the committee had in mind, and that is why the committee added the $100,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Foreign Affairs is indulging in a policy that is somewhat unique and exceptional in the legislation of the House. Without any information whatsoever, based largely on surmise, they increased the estimate of the appropriation $100,000. The amount that was expended from this appropriation last year was $1,034,000. The department only asked for $1,200,000, and yet the committee goes ahead in these times when money is scarce in this country and increases it deliberately $100,000 without a word of testimony. I have scanned the brief testimony of about a page upon this item, and not a word is said by the distinguished gentleman from the State Department who appeared to explain the estimate as to there being any need for any additional amount. That is an indication of Democratic economy—not to curtail the appropriation, not to give them the full amount, but to give them $100,000 more, based upon a pure surmise on the part of some of the members of the committee that they could use it by employing it in some other way.

Mr. FLOOD. No; not in some other way.

Mr. STAFFORD. In some other ways than were contemplated by the department, because if the department had in mind the expenditure of this money they would have increased the estimate. I think it is something so out of the ordinary to indulge in this practice in these times when the Treasury is in such need of money, and the public will be called upon continually to reimburse the Treasury for these expenditures, that we are at least warranted in insisting that it be no more than the amount carried in the estimate. Therefore I move to reduce the amount from $1,300,000 to $1,200,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 7, line 8, strike out "$1,300,000" and insert "$1,200,000."

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, the committee did not take this action without due consideration, and it was not Democratic extravagance, because the Democratic and Republican members of the committee voted alike. The State Department came before the committee with a suggestion to increase the salaries of our ambassadors from $17,500 to $25,000 a year. The committee voted it down. Some years ago this appropriation was increased for the purpose of allowing the State Department to give a contingent fund to the different large embassies in Europe, and I think at London the amount apportioned was $15,000. That item was increased for that purpose at that time by Congress, and the gentleman from Wisconsin, the watchdog of the Treasury, voted for it. That word "rent" was put in this item, authorizing the State Department to permit the use of this money for rent, and the appropriation was increased. The demands upon this fund became so enormous for cablegrams and other expenditures that probably none of it was left that could be utilized for this purpose. The committee, realizing that fact, added this $100,000, so that some of this money could be used to pay the rent at these places where rent is so high and where living is so expensive. The committee submits that to the House, believing that we ought to do something to democratize the embassies at the great capitals of Europe. The situation has been for years and is now that a man of small means, if he accepts one of these places at all, does it at the sacrifice of his personal fortune. I believe I can state—because it was stated here yesterday on the floor—that our present ambassador to Great Britain will go there to serve his country and will stay there just as long as his means will permit him to remain. When the fortune which he has accumulated in the forty-odd years of his life is exhausted in the expenses of that position, he will have to come home. This should not be. This will enable the State Department to help the able and efficient men, without great fortunes, who go to these places to pay the enormous rents they have to pay. The rent that is paid by our ambassador to France to-day is $12,000. If he did not have a lease of that house, if he should go out and another ambassador should walk in, the rent would be $18,000, and that would be $500 more than the entire salary of the ambassador to that country. I hope this item may be left as the committee reported it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This item was increased $100,000, and, as I understood it, at the time there was a strong recommendation by the department for an increase of the salaries of certain ambassadors and ministers; in fact, the salaries of the Diplomatic Service all down the line. So far as I was concerned, I felt that salaries in certain sections of the world ought to be increased, because expenses had so very materially increased, but I felt at the same time that expenses in certain other parts of the world had not increased sufficiently to make these large increases of salary necessary. It seemed to me, therefore, that to increase this contingent fund, so that the department could help out the man who was in an expensive section of the world, and not be compelled to increase where the cost of living had not gone so high, would be the wise thing to do. It was my belief that this $100,000 would enable them to level over the matter, to help the man who needed to be helped, and not be compelled to use it to help others who did not need it. Then I realized also the fact that if you once increase the salaries, no matter how much expenses might go down, you could never lessen them. In this matter you could lessen this amount or not give it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression that the $700,000 post fund that was carried in the existing bill was for the express purpose of providing equalization of salaries occasioned by the high cost of living.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That, I think, the gentleman will find is largely for the Consular Service.

Mr. FLOOD. It is also in the Diplomatic Service, but it does not apply to ambassadors and ministers. It applies to clerks, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman for some information. A few moments ago it was stated that the United States had recognized a Russian ambassador. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee if that is a fact?

Mr. FLOOD. What I said was that the ambassador from Russia, who is here now, came as the representative of the Kerensky government, and we did receive him and recognize him, and he is still acting as Russian ambassador; and we recognize no other diplomatic representative from Russia except Bakhmeteff, who came as representative of the Kerensky government, and has been recognized by the United States Government as the representative here of Russia.

Mr. McFADDEN. At the present time he is the accredited representative of Russia in this country?

Mr. STAFFORD. So far as our Government is concerned.

Mr. McFADDEN. Just another question. I recollect that prior to our entry into the war there were various amounts of Russian loans floated in this country, to the extent of several millions. I also remember the administration, just prior to the sending of the Kerensky representative here, advanced certain moneys—several hundred million dollars—to the Russian government. Do I understand that Mr. Bakhmeteff has charge of these funds as the accredited representative of the Kerensky government or what government?

Mr. FLOOD. He had charge of them. Most of those funds were paid out in this country for obligations the Russian government owed in this country. But the dealing with those funds was done through Mr. Bakhmeteff.

Mr. McFADDEN. I understand that when trouble broke out in Russia there was something like $180,000,000 of these funds on deposit here, and out of these funds the interest on all the former Russian loans was being paid. Is that correct?

Mr. FLOOD. Up to the fall of the Kerensky government we had advanced Russia over $187,000,000. What was left of that fund when the Kerensky government fell was used to pay obligations due in this country by Russia.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is that how the interest on these foreign loans is being paid?

Mr. FLOOD. The Russian loans?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. From this source and from other funds which the representatives from Russia had here.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I inquire if these Russian loans to which reference has been made and attention has been directed are loans made by the United States to the Russian Government or loans by private individuals?

Mr. FLOOD. I presumed the gentleman was speaking of the loans that the United States Government made to the Russian Government.

Mr. McFADDEN. I was speaking first of the various loans made by banking interests in New York and now held by American investors, and then I was speaking in reference to this fund that was advanced by the United States as an additional loan. When the troubles came over there and when the original Russian Government fell this money seemed to be here and flowing, with no one in charge of it, and since that time we recognized Kerensky. I have wondered upon what authority the Russian ambassador was administering that fund and how he had the right to pay the interest on these loans which were sold to individual investors in this country by these New York banking interests.

Mr. FLOOD. Simply by authority of the fact that he had possession of it, having received it for the Kerensky government, for whom it was intended by our Government.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. I wondered, in that connection, whether the United States itself should not properly control that fund.

Mr. FLOOD. I should think this Government loaned it to the Russian Government, but I will get further information and will put it in the RECORD to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. McFADDEN. I shall be glad.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRANSPORTATION OF DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR OFFICERS IN GOING TO AND RETURNING FROM THEIR POSTS.

To pay the actual and necessary expenses of transportation and subsistence under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, of diplomatic and consular officers and clerks in embassies, legations, and consulates and their families and effects in going to and returning from their posts, or when traveling under orders of the Secretary of State, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, $145,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph just read. Last year, as I recall, the House increased the rate of mileage that might be paid for traveling expenses for the diplomatic and consular officers from 5 cents to 10 cents a mile. Now the gentleman proposes to eliminate the limitation entirely, so that there may be paid any amount for expenses of travel, covering their actual expenses it is true, and it further provides for the payment of their subsistence during the time they are traveling and also for the expenses of the transportation for their families and effects. I think there should be some explanation of this radical departure, in this instance, from the limitation which has heretofore been carried on the expenditure of this item.

Mr. FLOOD. This item is unchanged from what it is in the current law——

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FLOOD. This item is the same as in the current law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg to inform the gentleman that it is changed.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not mean the amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not mean the amount; I mean the language.

Mr. FLOOD (reading)—

To pay the actual and necessary expenses of transportation under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, of diplomatic and consular officers and clerks in embassies, legations, and consulates in going to and returning from their posts, or when traveling under orders of the Secretary of State, at the rate of not exceeding 10 cents per mile, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, $125,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will compare that language with the language carried in the bill, he will see it is changed in several particulars. The limitation on the amount for reimbursement for mileage is eliminated, and next provision is made for the Government paying for their subsistence——

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And then you provide for an allowance to be expended for their families and effects in going to and returning from their posts.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is right. We did make very radical changes. I thought we made those changes in the current law last year, but I see it is in the present bill. They were made upon representation of the hardships that these officers sustained under the laws as we have been enacting.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, last year the committee came before the House and asked as a warrant for increasing the mileage from 5 to 10 cents that it was necessary that the diplomatic and consular officers should have that amount of pay for their mileage. We did so. Now the gentleman seeks to eliminate that and goes further and provides for their subsistence and also for the transportation of their families and effects.

Mr. FLOOD. As I said, I thought we made those changes last year. The State Department urged them very strongly last year, and we raised the mileage from 5 to 10 cents. Now, the statement made to the committee is this:

Mr. CARR. Ten cents a mile in a majority of cases—the flat 10 cents a mile—would, for the officer himself, I think, in practically every case be adequate. But the 10 cents a mile would not be adequate to reimburse the officer for the transportation of himself and members of his family, plus his personal effects, which, of course, have to go with him.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A departure in that respect is proposed?

Mr. CARR. A departure in that respect is proposed; it has been recommended for a year or so, and is now recommended again.

Mr. MILLER. Then you have also added the words in lines 19 and 20 on page 7, "and their families and effects."

Mr. CARR. We added that last year and the year before, I think. Congress did not receive it favorably, but they did raise the mileage from 5 to 10 cents a mile, with the qualification I have mentioned. The practical working of the transportation appropriation is perhaps better illustrated by some examples I could give you.

Two consuls were transferred from Swatow to Chungking in China. The cost for two officers was $435 and $355 Mexican, respectively. Both of those officers were unmarried. They took no account of the cost of transporting or the disposition of their household goods; that is, the cost of disposing of the goods at the old post and acquiring a new outfit at the new post. They received from the Government $293 and $173 Mexican, respectively. I do not know what the reason for the difference in the expenses, but whatever it may have been, in one case the man spent $435 and the Government gave him $293, and in the other case the man spent $355 and the Government gave him $173. They lost the amount of the difference in obeying the order of the Government in making the transfer.

Mr. MILLER. This was during the last year, when the 10 cents a mile prevailed?

Mr. CARR. I have not the date of it. That was before the rise in exchange.

Mr. STAFFORD. They always wish to be freed from any limitation on expenditures placed there by the Congress.

Mr. FLOOD. No; I think it was to enable them actually to reimburse the officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, Mr. Carr, even in the case instanced, did not know whether all these officers were proceeding under the 5-cent rate or the 10-cent rate; very likely the 5-cent rate, because the 10-cent rate was granted only a year ago.

Mr. FLOOD. Under the old rate it was stated they could not possibly move their families with them without going to extraordinary expense; but my recollection is he cited a great many cases of very great hardship, and the committee thought it wise to except these commissions and——

Mr. STAFFORD. This fund also provides for a transportation charge when the consular and diplomatic officers return home from their posts?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; going and returning.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman realize there should be some limitation on the amount of expenditure per mile?

Mr. FLOOD. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact, in reference to nearly all the items of expense that commissions and individuals can charge against the Government, that the committee in this bill has provided for an itemized statement. I do not mean it has done that in so many words, but it has made the appropriation so they have to itemize these expenditures.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the language to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. FLOOD. For instance, this international commission that settles disputes between this country and Canada. They now under this amendment get $8 a day, but we fixed the language so that they have to render an itemized statement of what they do expend. Up to that time they got $8 a day whether they expended it or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no such requirement in this provision under consideration?

Mr. FLOOD. I think the provision carries that idea.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And it says that the expenditures are to be under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary, and of course they will have a proper method of accounting.

I sincerely trust the gentleman will not insist on his point of order. If the chairman will permit me to make an addition to that which he has so strongly presented, I wish to say that one thing that was very persuasive to the committee was this, that our consular and diplomatic officers are traveling for the greater part outside of the United States. They are also traveling from one country to another. When a person is traveling in continental North America he can take a train and go to his destination and if he has to change cars it consumes only an hour or two hours to do so. It is stated that in many of these transfers in China and Japan and elsewhere, where means of communication are not numerous, and they have to go over certain routes part by rail and part by boat, and that often occurs at least during these troubled times, when passenger service is demoralized the world over, a man will have to stop at a hotel waiting for a boat, and the boat, instead of sailing on an appointed day, will not sail for a week or longer. Under existing law his expenses at the hotel during that time of waiting he has to pay himself, as his 10 cents per mile does not give him enough to pay for such long stops.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The 10 cents a mile which was allowed in the bill last year will not take care of the most of that. We do not appropriate any more than we did last year. We appropriate the same sum, but it will give flexibility and elasticity to this particular kind of service. I would like to urge this on the gentleman's attention, as one interested in the Diplomatic and Consular Service and who has visited countries in most sections of the world, that the greatest need we have, in my mind, now, to get adequate commercial and political representation in these lands, is to provide sufficient money to enable the force in the field to live. They can not live now on the amount they are getting. I know in my own experience of a number of the most brilliant young men who have entered the Consular Service, who were getting before they entered three or four thousand dollars a year, and who entered it, say, at $1,800 or $2,000, and then were obliged to go to Chile, South America, or to Shanghai, China, or into Siberia, and they could not possibly get sufficient money out of their transportation to pay the expenses of their journey there and that of their wives and families. And possibly after three or four years it was found that that particular man was the exact man they wanted in Stockholm, and who if at Stockholm would be of incalculable value to the Government, and they ordered him there. That is a long jump, and the old provision did not give sufficient money to pay his expenses, and men have been quitting the service by reason of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Five cents a mile was not adequate, and so Congress on the recommendation of the committee increased it to 10 cents.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And 10 cents, in many instances, is more than adequate—perhaps in a majority of cases it is more than adequate—and in many cases, and those the most deserving, it is not adequate, and the department simply asks, not for a greater amount but that it be made more flexible to enable them to take care of it. Certainly the salaries of our consular and diplomatic agents are low enough, usually ridiculously low, and we must pay the actual expenses incident to their necessary travel.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are asking for $20,000 more than appropriated last year.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman allow me to read a sentence or two from the hearings?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be glad to be informed on the subject.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to read from the testimony of Mr. Herbert C. Hengstler, of the State Department, who is chief of the Consular Bureau. While Mr. Wilbur J. Carr is director of the Consular Service, Mr. Hengstler in his work comes more directly in contact with the subject suggested by the reservation of the point of order.

On page 17 of the hearings he says:

> One of the difficulties here that we have experienced is that the present law requires a very complicated system of accounting. In the first place, we have to keep the accounts according to mileage, and, in the second place, we must have another account showing the actual expenses, so that for each trip the consular officer has to render two separate accounts, making a very complicated and cumbersome system.

And then, dropping down a few sentences:

> Even 10 cents a mile at the present time frequently does not cover the necessary expenses of the consul himself. One man sent to Russia recently had to spend almost $900 to take himself and his family to his post. Even if he had gotten 10 cents a mile you could realize he would have received but a small portion of this amount from the Government.
> We had a man who was sent a very short distance in Turkey. He had to go overland. I think he got about $50 mileage, as I recall. His actual expenses were almost $200. That is the reason we ask for this change in the bill.

Now, I submit to the gentleman from Wisconsin that if we are to keep the kind of Consular Service the needs of this country and the dignity of this country demand, it must be a flexible and an attractive service. We must enable the State Department to send a man from one post to another post whenever the requirements of the service make it proper to have the transfer made. It is not fair and it is not a thing that will appeal to the right sort of man in the Consular Service, if he has to pay hundreds of dollars out of his own pocket in order to move himself and his family to the new post. This does not give him a cent for himself. It simply pays his expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it is the practice now under existing regulations to pay the expenses of travel for the families of our diplomatic and consular officers?

Mr. ROGERS. It has been recommended by the committee for several years.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not in the present paragraph. It is not in existing law. I wish to have the attention of the chairman. It is, of course, new legislation on this appropriation bill. I now wish to inquire whether under the existing language it is the practice to pay the expenses of the families of these officers?

Mr. ROGERS. I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will direct the inquiry to the gentleman from Virginia as to whether it is the existing practice for the department to pay the expenses of travel for the families of the diplomatic and consular officers?

Mr. FLOOD. The change in this law is for the purpose of enabling the department to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I have the right to infer from the gentleman's statement that it is not the existing practice?

Mr. FLOOD. They can not do it, as I understand.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman permit? The practice always has been, as far as I know, that they permit a man when appointed and sworn in at home to begin to draw his salary, and he has a certain length of time to reach his post of duty. He draws his salary during that time—or did formerly—and that was a much longer time than took him to get there. It is the time that took him to get there a hundred years ago, and he would get enough money in the way of salary in the interval to provide his expenses in getting there.

Mr. FLOOD. This is when he is transferred from one place to another.

Mr. LITTLE. That would apply in the same way, I suppose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph. I wish to say to the gentleman that I do not wish to restrict the Consular Service in the freedom of transit of the respective officers, but I do not see why we should now inaugurate the policy of paying for the travel and transportation expenses of the families of these consular officers.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold making the point of order.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I know the gentleman wants to be fair on this, and he would be the last man really to cripple an important service of this kind. I can assure the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Wisconsin may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I believe that this is the most vital thing in the entire bill. I want to call the gentleman's attention to another thing. The gentleman will notice that the law respecting the allowance of military officers contemplates that married men will take their families, and recognition of that is given and provision is made in the law for that.

Now, here it is extremely desirable that men be accompanied by their families to these posts, no matter whether they are consular or diplomatic. In the Army it is sometimes advisable indeed that they be not accompanied by their families, as when they go into field service, but in going from post to post they are allowed to be accompanied, and therefore provision is made in the law for the transportation of the Army officers and their effects and families.

Now, here is a service that much more urgently, in my judgment, requires that men should be accompanied by their families, for efficiency in the service, if for no other purpose, and why should we not enact the item as it is framed in this paragraph?

I believe the gentleman can rest assured that there will be no abuses under it. If he thinks there is any danger in it I would be perfectly willing to join in a request that the amounts be itemized.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the policy always for the Government to place restrictions around the payment of allowances for the transportation of their officials. Here we are lifting all restrictions entirely and allowing the department to recognize any payment whatsoever that a diplomatic or consular officer may make. The gentleman knows that that may be subject to grave abuse.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is not what this paragraph permits. It says, "to pay the actual and necessary expenses, under such restrictions as the Secretary of State may prescribe." I am willing to write into the law that the agent, consular or diplomatic, must submit an itemized account, sworn to. That will cover it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will that meet the approval of the chairman of the committee? We are trying to legislate here.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Kansas and I are trying to legislate over here.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not the only legislator. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not compete with the distinguished gentleman, who rendered such distinguished service years and years ago in Armenia.

Mr. LITTLE. On that I will withdraw my remark. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. My objection to this paragraph is that there is no limitation on the department as to the expenditure. The policy of Congress is to restrict and limit expenditures. I recognize the need of the consuls visiting around. It is the criticism of the service that they are lodged and anchored too much in the place to which they are assigned. They merely think that their only duty is to do a little detailed office work and draw their salary. If there are some ambitious men among them who wish to go around and obtain useful information, I do not want to restrict them by arbitrary limitations.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I suggest that we insert this language. After the word "pay," in line 11, insert these words: "itemized and verified statements of the actual and necessary expenses of transportation."

Mr. FLOOD. I accept that amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. With that agreement, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to line 11, page 7, after the word "pay," by inserting the words "the itemized and verified statements of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota: Page 7, line 11, after the word "pay," insert "the itemized and verified statements of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $700,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this object for the fiscal year 1919, which is hereby reappropriated and made available for this purpose: Provided, That in his discretion the President may employ part of this fund for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think some explanation should be made of this large appropriation that is carried in this bill, as to the method of its expenditure. If I mistake not, this is the item on which I received the assurance of the chairman of the committee that after the conclusion of the war the proviso, if I permitted it to be inserted last year, would not be continued in the future.

Mr. FLOOD. No. Here was the understanding that I had with the gentleman: That if he did not raise a point of order against it last year I would use my influence with the committee not to report it after the war had ended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, everybody knows that the reason for that proviso is ended with the armistice, and it would be an abuse of the understanding if it is continued.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I must be shown, then.

Mr. FLOOD. It would not be an abuse of the understanding, because the war has not ended. The understanding was that I would use my influence with the committee after the war was ended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course I am not inclined to underestimate the influence on the floor of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman asks as to the method of expenditure. The emergency fund is included under section 291 of the Revised Statutes, which provides:

Whenever any sum of money has been or shall be issued from the Treasury for the purposes of intercourse or treaty with foreign nations, in pursuance of any law, the President is authorized to cause the same to be duly settled annually with the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, by causing the same to be accounted for specifically, if the expenditure may, in his judgment, be made public; and by making, or causing the Secretary of State to make, a certificate of the amount of such expenditure as he may think it advisable to specify; and every such certificate shall be deemed a sufficient voucher for the sum therein expressed to have been expended.

Now, the requirements of this statute are absolutely adhered to in the expenditure of this fund. Under this proviso this fund can be used for the payment for personal services in the District of Columbia. Of course, we all know that technically the war has not ended. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] thinks it has ended, and I hope it has, but technically it has not. So far as the State Department is concerned, it is probable that its activities have been increased with the signing of the armistice and its burdens probably may be increased generally after peace is concluded. Of course, so far as this fund is concerned, the necessity for it will not be increased after peace is concluded, but it will be greatly lessened; but we will have a great many visitors coming to this country from the different allied countries during the next 12 months. The papers say the King of England will be here.

At any rate, a great many distinguished visitors will be here who will have to be entertained out of this fund. We still will have to employ a lot of gentlemen to get confidential information for the State Department in reference to conditions in the various countries that have been at war, especially some of those that are to be made into nations out of former existing nations. We have to send confidential agents to get that information, and there is no other fund from which to pay them except this. The State Department, as we all know, has a small secret service corps, which has rendered the most splendid service during the period of the war, and which the department thinks it necessary to keep up during this time. It has to be paid for out of this fund. There is no other fund out of which to pay it. All of these activities necessitate the employment in the department here in Washington of an additional number of employees—not a great many, but some—and since this proviso has been in the law the department has been paying them out of this fund. There is no other fund out of which to pay them, especially since the legislative bill cut down their appropriation for clerk hire from $400,000 to $125,000. I will say again to the gentleman that I do not lose sight of the understanding we had on the floor of the House last year when the gentleman so generously abstained from making a point of order to this proviso.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recognized then that, as we were at war, there was an absolute necessity to grant to the President a large sum of money to be used as he saw fit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was necessary to have a fund for the employment of Secret Service men, or in any other way whereby he could obtain that information. These services might have to be employed here in the District of Columbia, and I was not going to raise a point of order against any activity that was necessary to protect the Government through its State Department in ferreting out spies and persons unfriendly to our cause.

Mr. FLOOD. They did splendid work.

Mr. STAFFORD. But now that emergency is past, and there is no justification why we should carry this provision in the Diplomatic bill, an appropriation virtually for clerical services in the Department of State. If the legislative bill has not carried an adequate appropriation the proper place to have that increased is in the other body at the other end of the Capitol, or to come before the Committee on Appropriations for an additional appropriation; but to have in this bill an appropriation that can be utilized for clerical services is not good legislation.

Mr. FLOOD. I agree with the gentleman that it is not good legislation, but so far as the emergency is concerned that the gentleman is talking about, I will repeat—and I hope the gentleman will agree with me—that so far as the State Department is concerned the emergency is just as great as it ever has been. They will have to keep up their Secret Service. They have to entertain all of these people who come here. They have to have people located here in Washington to help do these things, and during the next 12 or 15 months this will go on.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but so far the gentleman has advanced no reason for an authorization to allow this fund to be used to pay for personal services here in the District of Columbia. If the President wants a fund for the entertainment of royalty when they visit this country, that is another question.

Mr. FLOOD. This is the fund out of which that comes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But that does not involve the idea of payment for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that on page 91 of the hearings Mr. Carr makes this statement touching this item:

Mr. CARR. It certainly is not any less important by reason of the fact that the war is supposed to be over, because the security of the future welfare of the United States depends on a great many things being done, a great many loose ends being tied up, a great deal of information being collected, and the failure to do that would be vastly more costly than this small sum of money.

Then in another place in the hearings he says this concerning this item:

I think the unexpended balance at the present time is approximately $400,000.

Mr. ROGERS. With just about half of the year gone?

Mr. CARR. With just about half of the year gone and with a possibility of a great many expenditures in the second half of the year.

It is not possible to say what the balance may be. It is natural to suppose that we may need to know a good many things about some of the new countries. For example, it is possible that Austria will emerge from the peace conference very much subdivided into smaller nations and that Turkey may emerge from the peace conference in the same condition, and it is reasonable to suppose that the President and the Secretary of State may find it necessary to hurriedly send somebody to those countries to look into special subjects or to do special things. Those things frequently happen in international intercourse, and this would be the only fund for such expenses. There may be a good many things of that kind that may have to be done, and there is no other fund from which they could be done.

Mr. STAFFORD. What the gentleman has read confirms my position. He has not read language—at least, if he has I have not detected it—which shows the necessity for this fund to be used to pay personal services here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Carr said that there are many loose ends that need to be tied up, and so on, and they have people at work. They may work here in the District of Columbia or they may be over in Paris, or the President may need some of them when he comes back here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Every department official always wants to have a reserve fund which he may use in case the funds provided by the regular channel are not adequate. I would like to inquire of the chairman whether this is the fund from which the President is paying the retinue of college professors now with him at the peace council?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know anything about the retinue of college professors, but they are not paid out of this fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly direct us to what fund they are paid from?

Mr. FLOOD. The President has a pretty large fund of his own, and I expect they are paid out of that if they are paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression that the $700,000 available fund was used to pay the corps of professors from different colleges who have accompanied the President abroad.

Mr. FLOOD. No; not out of this. They do contemplate sending gentlemen to Austria and Hungary and Turkey and other places expected to be erected into States.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. This is a secret fund and has been so carried for years. Mr. KNOX, when he was Secretary of State, carried it as a secret fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; until the last year the fund only amounted to $200,000, but since our entry into the war they have asked for larger appropriations, and we have run it up to $700,000, and now that the war is over they ask that it shall be continued. Last year I had the distinct promise from the chairman of the committee that if the proviso was allowed to remain when the war was at an end—and we differ whether it is at an end—this proviso should be eliminated. I am strongly opposed to the idea that we should vest in the Secretary of State in this bill authority for the employment of individuals here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman realizes that there will be a very few months before the war is actually over and when all this matter will be settled.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; and that is why I am so persistent on my position.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. It might cost the Government a great deal more if it did not have this fund, and it could not do much harm if the provision is left in.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am going to make the point of order. If the gentleman wishes to have it inserted without the proviso, I am willing to make the point of order against the proviso with that understanding, or else I will make it against the whole paragraph.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Make it against the proviso.

Mr. STAFFORD. With the understanding that the proviso is not to be offered again.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. It could not be offered again unless subject to a point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know what the gentleman means by not being "offered again."

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it agreeable to the gentleman to have the paragraph remain in the bill as it is without the proviso?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman understands that if the State Department should insist that the proviso be written in the bill the Committee on Foreign Affairs might offer it again.

Mr. FLOOD. It could not be offered again.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Suppose the Senate should insert it. I do not want gentlemen to misunderstand our position about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. We had an understanding last year—although there is a difference as to the interpretation of it—that when the war was at an end the proviso should be eliminated. I am making the point of order to carry out that agreement as I understand it.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Mrs. Natalie Summers, widow of Madden Summers, late consul general to Moscow, $5,500, one year's salary of her deceased husband, who died at his post of duty.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph just read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly; I am very glad to accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman makes a point of order against the appropriation to Mrs. Summers?

Mr. STAFFORD. To reimburse Mrs. Summers.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, the committee recommends one year's salary, amounting to $5,500, to be paid to Mrs. Natalie Summers, widow of Madden Summers, late consul general to Moscow. This gentleman died there at his post of duty. He sacrificed his life in the cause of his country and these countries with which we were associated in the war. It has been the practice in this country—at least there are numerous precedents for it, and I say it has been the practice—that where a diplomatic and consular officer of the United States died at his post of duty in the discharge of his duty, to make an appropriation for his widow or heirs, and it has generally been one year's salary—just about what we do for the widows of Members of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand it is the uniform practice when a consular officer dies to pay a year's salary to his surviving widow or relatives?

Mr. FLOOD. I did not say it was the uniform practice, but I believe it is the practice, because there are so many precedents for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman refer me to any item having been reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House in the Diplomatic bill of that character in the last 10 years?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know about its being reported in the Diplomatic bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose there have been some instances where other consular officers have died at their posts of duty leaving surviving relatives.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, they are pretty good livers if no one has died at his post of duty within the last 10 years.

Mr. FLOOD. The only case that I am advised of just now, since I have been connected with the committee, was that of Mrs. Sorsby, whose husband did not actually die at his post of duty.

A claim was presented and a bill was introduced allowing Mrs. Sorsby one year's salary, and the difference between her situation and the situation in this case and the other cases was that her husband had been separated from the service for quite a number of years, but she undertook to prove that the disability of which he died resulted from the unhealthy location at which he had exercised the duties of minister.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, may I submit a question to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. One of my constituents, who was the consul at the city of Guadalajara, Mexico, recently died of pneumonia. I saw in the papers a few days ago that the Government, through the State Department, had directed that the remains be brought back home to be interred. I do not know what notice the gentleman would require before taking such a step, but if it is to be done in the case of Mrs. Summers, why should not this bill also carry an appropriation of one year's salary of the consulate at Guadalajara for Mrs. Silliman?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There are different facts.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, there are different facts, of course.

Mr. FLOOD. I think a bill making provision for Mrs. Silliman ought to be introduced, and the committee ought to consider it, and if it comes within the rules that the committee has acted on it ought to be reported.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Let me call the gentleman's attention to one or two facts of history——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to some cases that I happen to have investigated. The general deficiency act approved June 8, 1896, Statutes at Large, volume 29, page 268, carried an appropriation of $8,750 for Mrs. Eliza Gray, widow of Isaac P. Gray, late United States minister to Mexico.

The general deficiency act approved July 28, 1892, Statutes at Large, volume 27, page 283, carried an appropriation for the widow of Alexander Clark, late the minister to Liberia, amounting to $4,000, which was the amount of one year's salary.

In the deficiency act of March 3, 1893, an appropriation of $5,375 was carried in behalf of Mrs. Sarah O. Hanna, widow of Bayless W. Hanna, late a minister to the Argentine Republic.

An act for the relief of Mrs. Lizzie Phelps, widow of Seth Ledyard Phelps, late minister of the United States to Peru, was approved on August 3, 1886, for one year's salary.

An act of July 8, 1898, for the relief of Verona E. Pollock, appropriated $6,840, she being the widow of Alexander L. Pollock, late consul of the United States to San Salvador.

There are quite a number of such cases. I received a letter from the Secretary of State in reference to Mrs. Sorsby's case, which said that it has been the practice to make these appropriations, but drawing the distinction between Mrs. Sorsby's case and the cases in which the appropriations had been made, the difference being that Mr. Sorsby did not die while in the service. There is no doubt about the fact that Mr. Summers died at his post of duty while in the service of the United States. I do not recall that Congress has refused, when requested to do so, to make an appropriation for the relief of the widow of a representative, especially when that widow was greatly in need of financial assistance. The committee would not take the matter up and make an appropriation without a request in the shape of a bill being introduced to that effect, or a request before the committee, and in this case the facts were presented to the committee and were certainly most meritorious. This gentleman died at his post of duty, died from overwork for this country and for the allied countries, and died after having expended everything that he possessed, and he had actually expended his wife's fortune, or what was left of it from the Russian revolution. This widow is a Russian woman who married this American consul. She had a considerable estate of her own, but that now has been swept away by the Russian revolution.

The income from the estate had been used in maintaining this consul in his position. The post-allowance fund allowed him was expended, his salary was expended, everything he had was expended in maintaining his position as consul and in helping Americans who were stranded over there and who needed financial aid. On the whole, the committee thought that no more meritorious case could be presented for the consideration of Congress than this case. It stood on all fours, so far as the technical rights were concerned, with the cases which Congress had heretofore made appropriations in, and was probably more meritorious in fact than any of them. The committee recommended this appropriation, and I trust that the gentleman will not raise the point of order against it and that the Committee of the Whole will vote this deserving lady this amount of money. As I said, she is absolutely without means now. She has come to America and has secured a position in the State Department and is working for her living. Whether her salary is sufficient to support herself and child I do not know; but, at any rate, this would certainly help her in the effort she is making to support herself and her child. If Congress would vote the amount of one year's salary, the interest from that could be used to supplement the small salary she is getting in the State Department.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the gentleman will not press the point of order against this item, because if there ever was an item of this kind that came before Congress which was meritorious this is it. When you realize that these people were there during the revolution and during the time that living was dangerous and everything was extremely high, you can readily see how that little fortune, or what they had, was consumed. I read from the testimony of Mrs. Summers:

> You will perhaps better understand how expensive it was when I tell you that we had to pay $7 for a pound of bread, and that bread was made of straw. Then when you bought sugar it cost $15 a pound, and a pair of shoes cost you $100. So it was impossible to save anything there. An egg cost $1, and you can judge from those things how much it cost to live there.

This lady had a fortune of her own, and they used the income from that to help live upon, but when the Russian revolution took place, that fortune was swept away, and they no longer had any income from it. With these prices it is no wonder that they had absolutely nothing when Mr. Summers died. Mrs. Summers did not come to Congress and ask for the payment of money when doing nothing, but she came to America and asked for a position and procured a position in the State Department, earning $150 a month, and with that money, and with that money solely, she has been able to eke out an existence for herself and her boy. There are plenty precedents for this appropriation. When we vote the widows of deceased Members of Congress a year's salary, we ought not to refuse this woman a year's salary after what she and her husband endured in Russia. He stood to his position until death severed his relations, and during a most trying time in the history of the world. Can we do less than make this small appropriation to the widow and orphan son of one of the Consular Service's most able men?

I do not think there is a man on the floor of this House who would want to go through with what this family did. I am sure that any man who had done so would have had his fortune eaten up by the expense. Now, it is a meritorious case, and every other country, probably every country in the world, pensions the widows of its deceased consuls. This country, said to be the richest and the best of them all, does not grant such pensions, and all this woman will ever get for the great service which her husband has performed in the 15 years of their married life, and she helped him perform his duty, will be the $5,500 which we vote in this bill. There are plenty precedents for it; it is a meritorious case of the highest order and certainly one which Congress ought to recognize, and I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will not press his point of order against it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not make a point of order against this paragraph. There is but little I can say to supplement what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] have so well said in reference to this particular case, but I want to go on record, gentlemen, as saying that no man during this war more truly gave his life for his country than Madden Summers, consul general to Moscow. He served as consul for probably 20 years. His record in the State Department was of the best. He served in many different countries during that 20 years at a small salary, and, moving from place to place, it was impossible for him to accumulate any money. He married a lady who had a small fortune, but that fortune, as the gentleman from Virginia said, was wiped out by the Russian revolution.

He was sent to Moscow some time ago by this Government, having been specially chosen to represent our Government at that place during the important period of the war. He served there during dark and dangerous days of the revolution, giving his time and jeopardizing his life in behalf of his country. It was stated by the American ambassador and by other ambassadors from other countries at the time of his funeral in Moscow, as will be shown by the record, that he forfeited his life by overwork and his anxiety to serve his country and the people who had claims upon him as a representative of this country. He left not a dollar save a small sum which was invested in liberty bonds, the interest from which he turned over to his old widowed mother, who lives in the State of Alabama. He left a widow and a young boy of 12 or 13 years of age. As soon as his wife could obtain transport to this country she came here and brought that boy, and they are now living in the city of Washington, it being her intention to bring him up as an American citizen. And I say, Mr. Chairman, that having sacrificed his life for his country it seems to me it is little enough for Congress to do to give her one year's salary in order to aid her in giving that boy an education, so that he may be better fitted to become a useful American citizen.

As the gentleman from Virginia said, there are numerous precedents in the Diplomatic Service for this sort of action. The gentleman from Virginia has called attention to these precedents. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] to the fact that his own committee, the Committee on Appropriations, only a year or two ago brought in a bill which gave the widow of a United States Supreme Court judge $14,000, a year's salary, and a little prior to that another appropriation of the same amount was made for the family of another United States Supreme Court judge, and before that for the family of Mr. Justice Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court. No point of order was raised against those. There are many precedents that could be cited for this, and I wish to say that since I have been in Congress, knowing the facts as I do, knowing the necessities of that good woman and her fatherless boy, I know of no case which is more worthy than this one which is now presented to the House.

I knew Madden Summers from childhood. A truer, finer, more loyal man never lived. He was exceedingly capable, and if he had devoted his talents and energy to private affairs rather than in the service of his country he would not have died a poor man. No man had a higher conception of duty. It was that sense of duty which caused him to remain at his post in Moscow when others were leaving, and in spite of threats against him, and to at last suddenly fall a victim to overwork and worry on account of the many official duties which were pressing upon him. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not insist upon his point of order, but will permit the House to vote upon the proposition to make this slight recompense to Mrs. Summers and her bright, fatherless boy. Madden Summers, if he is permitted to know, will appreciate it more than he would the most costly monument that could be erected to his memory.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I only want to occupy the floor for a minute or two to say that the suggestion I made in reference to the widow of John R. Silliman is justified in every argument that has been made in behalf of Mrs. Summers. Mr. Silliman was not only consul during the revolution in Mexico but during a revolution that has continued so long that it makes the Russian revolution look like a brief May-day picnic. Mr. Silliman, because of his conscientious, courageous adhesion to his duty and his efforts to protect the rights of citizens of the United States, was arrested and put into a vile prison and sentenced to be shot. Of course, the authorities then controlling Mexico thought better of it and did not shoot him. Mr. Silliman acted practically as our ambassador in Mexico for a long time. He was the only reliable agent that the Government had to look after diplomatic affairs, although he did not have diplomatic rank. Subsequently, when things quieted down a little in Mexico he was made consul or consul general at Guadalajara, and there died at his post a few days ago. If this item is justified the other certainly is, and I agree with the gentleman in saying that I believe this is a proper appropriation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively to all that has been said in defense as a warrant for this private claim being carried in this appropriation bill. I have scanned the testimony that was given before the committee and have since reviewed it. I do find cases dating from 1896 back where the Congress did vote a year's salary to widows of diplomatic officers. I only find one instance where an appropriation has been voted for the widow of a consular officer. Now, there is a statute which has been referred to in the previous paragraph providing for the payment to widows and heirs at law of diplomatic and consular officers of an allowance equal to the amount of the salaries during the period of the transportation of the remains back to their residence in the United States. That amount of money has been paid to this widow. The widow is now employed at the department. I assume she is giving full value to the Government in the service she is rendering; but, Mr. Chairman, here we have an instance cited by the gentleman from Texas, and there are many instances, where similar action will have to be taken if we recognize this claim. I question whether it is good policy to establish a precedent, the first I have been able to find since 1896, nearly 25 years, and therefore I make the point of order that it is legislation not authorized on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the commission to continue its work under the treaties of 1884, 1889, 1905, and 1906 between the United States and Mexico, $62,700.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I think this item, of course, should be continued in the bill. I am not going to advocate any particular amount that should be contained in the paragraph, although I have some views of my own on the subject. But I do want to call the attention of the committee to the elements that are included in the amount that the bill carries. This international commission that is supposed to be fixing the boundary line between Mexico and the United States has had a most precarious existence. No matter which party seems to be in power, there is always an international boundary commission, and the boundary line seems to be about as unsettled and undetermined now as it was in the beginning. The Rio Grande River moves a little now and then one way or another, and I presume it is advisable to determine whether the boundary line has shifted a few feet this way or that way from year to year. In many instances where the Rio Grande has made considerable of a change in its location the matter is still undetermined whether the territory that has thus been cut off belongs to Mexico or the United States. I believe they have now a tentative program whereby they propose to swap horses—a little land we lost for a little land they lost. That is, we propose to do so. Whether we can accomplish it or not I do not know. Some of the most fantastic things imaginable are pervading the atmosphere of this boundary at this time.

Part of the city of El Paso is in dispute. I do not state this as an indication that there is no work to do, but as an indication that no work has been done, going back through the years until the memory of man runneth almost not to the contrary. This has been a sinecure position. It is now. Treaties have been made which, I suppose, require to be kept going. It is now proposed by the gentleman in charge—and I wish to state here that the committee listened to him, I think, with a great deal of interest, and he really impressed me as being a man who really wanted to do something, and it was quite refreshing and quite unique in the history of international boundary commissions between this country and Mexico, but whether the views he presents will accomplish something or not is a different question—it is proposed by the gentleman to use a large part of this money for the purpose of determining the possibility of irrigation on each side of the boundary line, and particularly in the United States along the rivers that flow into the Rio Grande. Manifestly that has nothing on the face of this earth to do with the purpose for which the commission was created. It has nothing to do with the fixing of the boundary, except in a most remote sense.

Now, I join with the Members of the House generally in favoring strongly the irrigation of arid lands wherever they may be found, and I am in favor of irrigating any land within the United States that is capable of being irrigated and open it up to settlement. But we have a service in the United States whose specific business it is to do that very thing, and that is the Reclamation Service. Now, the Reclamation Service has engineers, it has experts, and that sort of men; and it is proposed now that this international boundary commission shall employ additional engineers and experts. Manifestly, to me it appears to be a duplication of work. I do not think the amount carried in this bill can be wisely expended, but I am not going to make any motion to cut it down. I am going to content myself with stating the facts briefly to the committee and express the fond hope that I trust some day we will make a treaty with Mexico that will end this infernal nuisance of a continuing commission that does nothing. Now, I imagine some people will say that some commissioners have done something. Yes. From the reports they have made they have gauged water in the streams and listened to the twittering of the swallows and observed the movement of the sunbeams down there, and all to no practical purpose. I do think this sort of a thing ought to be ended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman does the gentleman who now occupies the position of commissioner, and those who preceded him, justice. This commission was organized under a treaty between this country and Mexico. The last modification of it was made during the last Roosevelt administration. This treaty obligates this country to appoint a commissioner and an engineer and a clerk to meet similar appointees from Mexico to fix, from time to time, the boundary line between this country and the Republic of Mexico. As we all know, the Rio Grande is a shifting stream. Its bed is here to-day, while some time in the future it will be 50 yards or 100 yards or maybe a mile away, running all around the territory that belongs to the United States and putting it on the Mexican side of the river, or vice versa. And this treaty is made to establish a place to which these pieces of land that are cut off by the change in the stream of the river, called bancos, belong. It was realized when the treaty was made that the commission would remain in existence for a long time and, indeed, as long as the Rio Grande continued to change its course and until some system could be devised by which the Rio Grande could be kept in its bed. For a long time the American commissioner was Gen. Mills, a retired Army officer, who received no salary. The other officials of the commission did receive salaries. Questions of large moment have arisen by reason of the shifting of the Rio Grande River. They involve possibility of war and involve the citizenship of a great many——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman point to any specific, affirmative conclusion at which the commission has arrived in fixing the boundary at any one spot in the last 10 years?

Mr. FLOOD. At Nogales, a town that has grown up on the American-Mexican boundary, nobody knew where the boundary line was. This very gentleman who is commissioner now, and his Mexican associate, went there and fixed the boundary line of that town.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it not true that that is still in process of adjustment?

Mr. FLOOD. It is not. It is absolutely and definitely settled. As to the bancos, the question arises whether these bancos have been settled. It has been agreed upon and put in a subsequent treaty that where there were less than 600 acres of land in a banco it should be considered as belonging to the country on the side of the river on which that banco was.

There are a great many questions of large moment that have been settled. There is a question in El Paso, involving 600 or 700 acres of land, thickly built up, constituting the southern end of El Paso, known as the Chamizal tract, about which Gen. Mills and his Mexican associate had many conferences, reaching different conclusions, and finally brought down a Canadian, and he did not agree entirely with either one of them. That is unsettled, it is true, but the Mexicans as well as Americans have come to realize that that is American territory, and the people who live on it will have no fear of its being thrown into Mexico.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit an inquiry, I want to say that we have had a controversy for a century or more with Great Britain as to the boundary line between the United States and Canada. At last a boundary commission was appointed to locate the line. That commission has been working for a very few years, and they have the work all done with the exception of the map-making. Some of them are up in Alaska now. Field work there may require another year, and office work for two or three years may be needed, but it is a fine, complete job.

Mr. GARNER. Is that the Tawney Commission?

Mr. FLOOD. No; that is the Barnard Commission. That has done good work.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is a job that was well done. Is this boundary between the United States and Mexico always going to be an elusive and undetermined thing?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me to interrupt, I will say that just as long as the Rio Grande rises and at different times changes its course, you have got to have somebody to adjust these differences existing there.

Let me say to the gentleman from Minnesota that when I first came to Congress I went on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I was under the same impression that he is now under, that this was money wasted. I went on there with the determination to have this item cut out, assuming that I knew all about it, and I thought I was going to do a very statesmanlike and economical thing, and I thought I would put this off. I was green and inexperienced then, but when I heard the facts of the case, when three Secretaries of State made statements before the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the effect that these questions arising from the boundary of this stream between these two countries could be handled more economically in this way than through the State Department, I was disarmed.

I make this statement now: Three different Secretaries of State—Mr. Root, Mr. Knox, and Mr. Bryan—each stated that from the economical viewpoint it was more desirable to have this boundary commission than to do the work through the State Department.

Mr. FLOOD. I will go further than the gentleman from Texas, and say that of course as long as the Rio Grande continues to shift its course, some such arrangement as this will have to be kept in existence to determine where the true boundary line is. But the gentleman who is now the American commissioner came before us and submitted a proposition which may lead to results that will not necessitate this commission longer, if his plans are successful, because he proposes to keep the Rio Grande in its present bed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. And that is what this additional appropriation is for. He proposes to have a survey made of the rivers that are tributary to the Rio Grande in America and in Mexico. The gentleman from Minnesota wants some other service to do it. The service that he has in mind, the Irrigation and Reclamation Service, has no right to do it. These commissioners, representing America and Mexico, under the authority of this treaty, can go into Mexico and make their survey. They can make a survey of the rivers that are tributary to the Rio Grande in these two countries, and make a report to these two Governments, and then, if the Governments initiate a treaty by which proper appropriation can be made to build dams to control the flood waters of the tributaries of the Rio Grande River, the Rio Grande will flow down its present course and constitute a permanent boundary between the two countries, and there will be no necessity for a future commission to determine from time to time the boundary line. It seems to me that is a most sensible thing to do. When the tributary waters of the Rio Grande are controlled there will be no reason for fixing a new boundary. That is what the appropriation is for.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do not for a moment share the gentleman's optimism, that the carrying out of the present program outlined by the commissioner will produce the results expected. In other words, I do not believe that the regulation of the tributaries and the regulation of their flow for irrigation purposes will result in the Rio Grande maintaining a permanent course. There are going to be practically the same operations of nature. The Rio Grande will keep on shifting.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman's view does not accord with that of the Mexican engineer and the American engineer on the subject.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Well, I remember what James J. Hill said, a living truth that no one then believed, and it is true now, that "There is only one way to keep the Mississippi River from changing its course, and that is to lath and plaster the bottom of it from one end to the other."

Mr. FLOOD. This is not as big a river as the Mississippi.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; but it is more apt to change its course. The Rio Grande is in a more level country and more subject to floods, and it moves back and forth.

What I want to inquire particularly about is this: Does not the gentleman think it would be a wiser thing for us to propose a treaty with Mexico to fix some kind of a boundary line that would be stable, so that a man on the line could know whether he was on the American side or on the Mexican side?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not see how we could give away American territory or take Mexican territory. Certainly I see no constitutional way by which we can cede American territory to another country.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We could certainly take a spot and say, "That is the boundary line," and keep it there, just as we have done with respect to the Canadian boundary line.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is it not a fact that each country must get water from the river, and in order that they may do that the boundary line must go along the river? If the river goes over the boundary, the people of the other country do not get the water they need for irrigation purposes. That is a very essential matter, it seems to me. That is where the great fight will come.

Mr. FLOOD. I think it is essential to give the river a permanent bed before we can make a treaty defining where the boundary line of the river is. This proposition is in the right direction. Part of this appropriation also goes to pay gaugers, to show how much water we are entitled to and how much Mexico is entitled to. That work certainly ought to be done, because if we use water that belongs to Mexico it creates a liability—it might be a large liability—on the part of our Government. We have already had to settle one large claim of this kind.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Each country is entitled to half, is it not?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. So I think the appropriation is not at all extravagant. The commissioner, Judge Hill, of Tennessee, was before the committee, and showed exactly what he wanted to do with the whole amount. I hope the committee will adopt the item just as it is.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I should like to invite the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] to the fact that the $35,000, to which he referred, has been increased to $62,700, which indicates that this seems to be a growing project.

Mr. FLOOD. No; it is not growing .

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Developing?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Getting to be a bigger river?

Mr. FLOOD. Not at all. The appropriation in 1912, the last year of the Taft administration, was $50,000. Since then we have cut it down, and this is only a small amount more than what it was the last year of that administration.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have here an increase of appropriation of $766,000 from that carried in the present appropriation act.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that the chairman should give some information to the House as to the reason for this unusual increase in the appropriation.

Mr. FLOOD. The principal increase in appropriations in this bill, Mr. Chairman, is in the Consular Service. The committee tried to carry into effect the plans adopted by the State Department for the improvement and development of our Consular Service and in that effort we have made this increased appropriation here, and in other items with reference to the Consular Service we have recommended similar increases.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, if the gentleman will permit, the salaries of consuls general, vice consuls, and consuls are established by law.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the department can not increase those salaries except by a change of the substantive law?

Mr. FLOOD. The department can not increase those classes, but they can appoint consuls to higher classes than they have now. But what I was going to say was that the department proposes—and we are in sympathy with that purpose—to add to the Consular Service 150 vice consuls at salaries ranging from $2,000 to $3,000. Then the department proposes to have 25 consular assistants and to increase the regular consular force by 25, and to abolish the consular agents who draw fees. There are 127 of them. There is an apparent increase of 200 in the Consular Service and a real increase of some 75, because the consular inspectors are increased from 5 to 7. Then the purpose was to appoint more consuls to the higher grades up to that of consul general, and to have no consuls under $3,500. They can accomplish that by appointing consuls only to the sixth grade. The vice consuls will get up to $3,000, and the consuls will begin at $3,500 and go up to the salaries allowed consuls general.

That plan, as worked out, will give 200 addition in the paid service, and to increase these salaries will necessitate an increase in this bill of $766,000, which the committee has recommended.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice that the committee in this instance gave the department its full estimate.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any instance in the bill where the committee declined to give the department the full estimate?

Mr. FLOOD. The committee was disposd to cut the department estimates in several instances, but we were always confronted with the proposition that where we have done that the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman is a distinguished member, had come along with a deficiency appropriation bill and given them what they had asked for.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that was the warrant for the gentleman's action in closing his eyes and granting them, in accordance with the estimate made and in one particular case $100,000 more than the estimates, when there was no request for it?

Mr. FLOOD. I did not say that.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was no request from the department for that.

Mr. FLOOD. I have given you a reason, and a good reason, and it was not the reason the gentleman quoted on the floor. I say we were confronted with the fact when we wanted to keep the estimates down the gentleman's committee had gone on and given them what they asked for.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman ought not to indulge in hyperbole of statement.

Mr. FLOOD. It is not hyperbole of statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. The record shows that you did increase this item.

Mr. FLOOD. I cite the record, which shows that the Committee on Appropriations has increased appropriations to the full estimates of the department and gave large amounts in addition to what the Foreign Affairs Committee had given for the same purpose. I said that as to the items we proposed to cut down we found that when there had been a reduction the department went to the Committee on Appropriations and got from that committee the amount they asked from us.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, in some few instances.

Mr. FLOOD. In the instances we wanted to cut down.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not in every instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out "$62,700" and insert "$37,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 10, line 8, strike out "$62,700" and insert "$37,500."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this item provoked some discussion a year ago, and it was called to the attention of the House that the item was then sought to be increased from $25,500 to $37,500, the amount then carried in the bill. If my memory serves me right, though the item remained as recommended by the committee, the Senate reduced the amount to $25,500, but the conferees restored it to the original amount.

Now, what do we find here? We have a useless commission, which was in innocuous desuetude for several years. It was so useless that the Democratic administration under Mr. Bryan failed to appoint a commissioner for several years, and there was so little usefulness that a former Member of this House, Mr. John Wesley Gaines, predecessor of the Representative from Tennessee, Mr. JOSEPH BYRNS, said that there was hardly any work whatsoever to do, and he resigned because he got ashamed of taking the money from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. FLOOD. Where did the gentleman get that idea?

Mr. STAFFORD. I happened to have the pleasure of the company of Mr. John Wesley Gaines when we stopped at the same hotel.

Mr. FLOOD. He told the committee that he almost worked himself to death on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know Mr. Gaines had the reputation of being a most erudite Member, searching out information on more subjects than we had ever known before, but on this commission he found no work to perform.

What do we find here as a justification for this commission to determine the elusive and ever-changing boundary line of the Rio Grande between the United States and Mexico? Why, they want to constitute themselves into a commission to establish reclamation projects along the Rio Grande.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not want to be diverted from this line of thought, but I will later on be very glad to yield.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Go on.

Mr. STAFFORD. We find that this additional appropriation is for that purpose, to determine surveys of the river. We find Commissioner Hill, when explaining the reason for this additional appropriation, using this language:

I was speaking about this additional appropriation; $10,000 of that appropriation is for the purpose of establishing some eight or nine gauging stations on the river, so as to take the water measurements at different points, in order to find out where the water comes from that forms the Rio Grande River, and find out what part comes from tributaries in the United States.

If we are going to launch into the project of converting a boundary commission into a commission to erect large reservoir dams, so as to keep this ever elusive and evasive stream within bounds, why, this appropriation will mount and mount until it reaches the millions. Now, I am speaking seriously. We have a Reclamation Service and we have a Geological Survey. The Geological Survey has a large appropriation to determine the flow of the streams throughout the country. We have a Reclamation Service that can be called upon by this commission; but this commission, like other commissions that have no real work, want to magnify their importance and want to engage in some work that is not in keeping with the original purpose of the law.

I am not surprised that the committee recommends everything that is asked for by the department. So far as we have covered the appropriations recommended by this committee, there is no evidence of a disposition on their part to curtail expenditures—none whatsoever. Here we are virtually doubling the appropriation to embark on the extravagant policy of seeing whether it is feasible to erect impounding dams on the Rio Grande. They are going to employ expert men whose services can be obtained from other activities of the Government. I think there should be some check on the activity of these useless commissions. Mr. Hill may be very sincere and conscientious in his work, nevertheless the committee owes it to the House in these times to try and keep these activities within reasonable bounds. If, as I remember, this commission did not have a commissioner for three years, why can we not now keep the appropriation down to the amount carried in last year's appropriation bill, which was $12,000 more than was carried in the previous bill, $12,000 more than they expended in the prior year? Why can we not adhere to that amount, rather than go into this extravagant policy of almost doubling the appropriation and rambling off into these outside agencies, which have no real merit at the present time? Are we going to use this investigation as a warrant for expending millions and millions of dollars upon irrigation projects on the Rio Grande? I do not think anybody is in sympathy with such an idea in these present times, when the money of the country is needed for so many pressing undertakings.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, it happens that I have some familiarity with the section of the country out yonder "Where the Rio Grande ripples when there's water in its bed," and I know a little about the problems confronting these gentlemen on the commission. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] calls the commission useless, and says that the work done by them is without value. I can not agree with him. In the first place, we are commanded by a treaty to do it, and we have to maintain a commission to determine the boundary line between Mexico and the United States. That boundary has been defined along the line that divides northern Mexico from New Mexico, Arizona, and California, but the real difficulty is in determining the boundary from the city of El Paso down to the mouth of the river below Brownsville. Along that border we are confronted with a condition that neither the wisdom of Congress nor the skill of the engineers can cope with successfully. We define the boundary to-day, and to-morrow there will be a flood in the river from the melting of the snows of Colorado, and a large amount of water will come from the streams on both sides that flow in and the boundary is shifted by nature. We can not help that.

During the period when the revolution made it impossible to continue the work intelligently appropriations were lessened, and lessened, I suppose, to as small an amount as we could make in view of the fact that we are bound by treaty to help support the commission. Now comparative quiet has at last come to Mexico, and she has announced herself ready to take up the work.

Mr. FLOOD. They have been at work for a year.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I know, but they are ready now to go to work more assiduously. We can not refuse to keep the commission alive; we are bound by the treaty.

With reference to what is claimed as reclamation projects, I do not understand it to be that at all. In the State of Texas there are two or three considerable streams that are tributary to the Rio Grande, the Pecos River and the Devils River being the principal ones. On the other side are the Conchos, the Sabinas, the San Juan, and other rivers contributing to the Rio Grande. Of course, Mexico could build dams there and could, if she pleased, permanently lessen the supply in the Rio Grande by absorbing all the waters contributed by the Conchos, which are the largest tributary streams. She could shut off the water of the Sabinas and other streams, and so ultimately, if inclined to do it, she could permanently injure the people of this country by lessening the amount of water available for irrigation. Under the treaty, each is entitled to one-half of the flow of the river.

I dare say that the purpose in the mind of the commissioner is that dams should be erected on the Pecos and the Devils Rivers and other streams worthy of putting dams across. The Mexicans would put them on their rivers, and by withholding from the flow into the Rio Grande a large part of the water contributed by those streams it would have the tendency to make more permanent the boundaries that may have been defined.

Mr. FLOOD. The flood waters which cause the stream to change its bed would be impounded.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That was the statement which was made, but I do not think it is entirely true, because the flood frequently comes from the melting of the snows in Colorado.

Mr. FLOOD. The streams that come from the mountains will be impounded.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; there are no mountains on the Pecos and on the Devils River to amount to anything. They are the biggest streams on our side. There are mountains back in Mexico, near the Conchos. This boundary work also serves a useful purpose in helping to preserve the peace.

Mr. STAFFORD. My amendment carries the same amount that was carried in the current year, but what I want to prevent is these irrigation projects.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman could specifically forbid anything being done in that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. I limit it by putting in the amount carried in the present bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, if adopted, will so reduce the appropriation as to make it impossible for the commission to carry on the proposed work with reference to investigating the stages of the river at various seasons of the year and the source of water supply which flows through the river. The purpose of these investigations is intended to secure information expressly with reference to irrigation. In the southern Rio Grande Valley in Texas is a very large area that in the last few years has begun to be irrigated. This section of the country is developing very rapidly, and the interest in irrigation is increasing. As this work goes on and more and more water is diverted from the Rio Grande, necessarily the United States will become involved in controversy with the Republic of Mexico and the citizens of Mexico with respect to the amount of water diverted from the river on the American side and the Mexican side.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Let me say that so much water was taken out in southern Texas that the Mexicans protested that we were getting more than our share.

Mr. FLOOD. Let me call attention to the fact that when the dam above El Paso was built we had to agree to furnish Mexico enough water to irrigate 60,000 acres of land.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the committee will bear with me a moment, I desire to say that if we await the time when Mexican subjects and the Republic of Mexico make claims against the United States with reference to the diversion of these waters, and if we are not in possession of any facts whatever, the Government of the United States will be in a very embarrassing position with reference to these claims. If, however, the boundary commission, which is international in character, and which is empowered to make these investigations not only on the American side but upon the Mexican side, is permitted to go ahead with this work, it will have on hand information and data with which to meet these claims, and upon which an equitable and fair adjustment of the relative rights of the two countries can be based.

I want to say in this same connection that this information will not only be desirable from the standpoint of irrigation, but incidentally it will be valuable along the lines of the strictly boundary proposition, because, unless the boundary is definitely fixed from time to time in accordance with the changes of the river, citizens of Mexico will present claims against the United States Government at inflated valuations, and unless we have accurate and concise data at hand the Government will be placed in an embarrassing position in meeting these claims. I hope the committee will retain the item in the present form, because to reduce it, as the gentleman from Wisconsin proposes, would seriously handicap the commission in carrying on this proposed work, and so far as irrigation is concerned would absolutely render it impossible.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOUNDARY LINE, ALASKA AND CANADA, AND THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

To enable the Secretary of State to mark the boundary and make the surveys incidental thereto between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada, in conformity with the award of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal and existing treaties, including employment at the seat of government of such surveyors, computers, draftsmen, and clerks as are necessary; and for the more effective demarcation and mapping, pursuant to the treaty of April 11, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain, of the land and water boundary line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, as established under existing treaties, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, including the salaries of the commissioner and the necessary engineers, surveyors, draftsmen, computers, and clerks in the field and at the seat of government, rental of offices at Washington, D. C., expense of printing and necessary traveling, for payment for timber necessarily cut in determining the boundary line not to exceed $500, and commutation to members of the field force while on field duty or actual expenses not exceeding $5 per day each, to be expended in accordance with regulations from time to time prescribed by the Secretary of State, $40,000, together with the unexpended balances of previous appropriations for these objects: Provided, That hereafter advances of money under the appropriation "Boundary line, Alaska and Canada, and the United States and Canada," may be made to the commissioner on the part of the United States and by his authority to chiefs of parties, who shall give bond under such rules and regulations and in such sum as the Secretary of State may direct, and accounts arising under advances shall be rendered through and by the commissioner on the part of the United States to the Treasury Department as under advances heretofore made to chiefs of parties: Provided, That when the commissioner is absent from Washington on official business he shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses of subsistence, not in excess of $8 per day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I wish to inquire the reason why the committee increased the amount of actual expenses that may be paid to the members of the field force from $3.50, as carried in existing law, to $5. I presume that is because of the higher cost of living.

Mr. FLOOD. Exactly. Dr. Barnard, the commissioner, did not appear before the committee, but he made a statement to me—he may have written me a letter—and I made it to the committee, to the effect that expenses along this boundary line were very high, and that the field force could not get along and pay their expenses on $3.50 a day. The increased cost of living along the boundary line was very considerable. It is expensive to maintain themselves there at any time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this a flat per diem voted to them regardless of the amount they spend for actual expenses?

Mr. FLOOD. No; the commissioner requires an itemized statement, and he can not allow them exceeding $5 a day.

Mr. STAFFORD. What per diem do they receive?

Mr. FLOOD. They receive a monthly salary. The commissioner himself gets $5,000 a year, the engineer to the commissioner gets $3,300 a year, the chief clerk and disbursing officer $1,700 a year, and he stays here. The surveyor gets $2,200 a year, and then they have another surveyor at $2,160, some topographers, who I suppose stay here most of the time, and then they have a lot of young axmen and rodmen and employees of that kind. They are paid $75 and $80 and $100 a month when actually engaged on the line.

Mr. STAFFORD. In what part of the Alaskan boundary is the field force at present engaged?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, they have finished that entirely.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then what is the need of providing this $5?

Mr. FLOOD. The field work of the location of the 4,150 miles of boundary, the location of which was intrusted to these commissioners, namely, from the Arctic Ocean to Mount St. Elias and thence to Cape Muzon, and from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean, excepting through the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River, is practically completed, there remaining to be done during the coming season only the erection of some range marks in Passamaquoddy Bay, the setting of some monuments for a short distance on the St. Croix River, the examination of part of the located boundary line east of the summit of the Rocky Mountains by the United States parties, and the survey of 16 miles of boundary line along the Maine Highlands by Canadian parties. The work has been done jointly under the direction of one United States and one British commissioner by the United States and the Canadian survey parties, and one-half of the expense has been borne by each Government. The field work will be completed during the coming season, but as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] said, it will take several years after that to complete the office work and make up their report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I believe this is a pretty large amount to be granted to members of the field force in the territory that the gentleman has just referred to. Everyone realizes that the cost of living in Alaska is out of all comparison to the cost in the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am directing attention to the commutation and per diem allowance for the field force.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin will appreciate that these men have to go into the interior, into inaccessible places, where communication is not easy, where lines of transportation even do not exist. Subsistence has to be carted in, sometimes by horse, sometimes by men on their backs, sometimes by canoe. It is exceedingly expensive. These field parties locating the boundary are obliged under the necessities of the case to operate in areas usually remote from where lines of communication exist. It is just like fitting out an expedition to penetrate into inaccessible places. It is mighty expensive. The amount heretofore allowed was $3.50 per day, and I am sure the gentleman will appreciate the fact that if we increase it by $1.50 a day, that is not an unusual increase, having in mind the increase in all things of that character.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, we have a standard for such allowances and we are voting $4 a day on account of field activities, and why should we vote $5 a day to this fund?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman will quite appreciate that $4 a day may be all right for a person living in a civilized region, but——

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the amount voted for the field force in the forest reserves out in the Rockies and mountainous districts.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This is much different from that in every way, because they have established places from which supplies can be secured in the forest reserves, and they have roads, and so forth, but these men have to go into the wilderness——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Hundreds of miles away, perhaps.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. For instance, in operating between Minnesota and Canada, although the distance from the end of the railroad was not perhaps more than 75 miles, they had to go by canoe and overland, and it was a trip which took a long time, even from a distance, as the gentleman from Texas has observed, of about 50 or 75 or 100 miles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the expense of transportation borne by the Government and not by the individual members of the field party?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is true, but I am advised by the commissioner, and as I said before I wish we could always get as efficient a man as this commissioner to do the Government's business, for he just delivers us dollars for every cent we give him—he informs me he simply can not keep up the subsistence within the amount allowed.

Mr. STAFFORD. When does the gentleman believe the field force of this commission will be ended?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This year; this will be the last bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman, with the assurance given by the gentleman, who is well versed in the work of this commission, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BUREAU AT BRUSSELS FOR REPRESSION OF THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

To meet the share of the United States in the expenses of the special bureau created by article 82 of the general act concluded at Brussels, July 2, 1890, for the repression of the African slave trade and the restriction of the importation into and sale in a certain defined zone of the African Continent of firearms, ammunition, and spirituous liquors, for the year 1920, $125.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I rise for information. We are all interested in the effort of the administration to establish democracy the world over. We see here an item for the repression of the African slave trade. I think the committee would be interested in information as to the extent that there is some activity on the part of our Government in conjunction with any other in the suppression of the African slave trade referred to in this item.

Mr. FLOOD. Our Government is a party to a treaty for that purpose, signed at Brussels, July 2, 1890, and proclaimed about two years later. Now, this treaty——

Mr. STAFFORD. Has this some reference to the slave trade for which King Leopold of Belgium was criticized so severely a few years back and which appeared in the public press?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know about that. There has been a species of slave trade going on in Africa, and a number of nations, through their accredited representatives, met at Brussels in 1890, later in 1899, and again in 1906 and entered into an agreement to suppress that slave trade, and also agreed to provide a certain amount of money for this purpose. I understand that it has almost been entirely suppressed, but the treaty is still in effect.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose the officer is still being paid out of this money, and it is a continual appropriation, because an officer never gives up, even after the work is ended.

Mr. FLOOD. If he is being paid, he is being paid very little by this country, and if he can live on that he is a very economical official.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, after receiving the informing information from the gentleman from Virginia, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pan American Union, $100,000: Provided, That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the union shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the chairman of the governing board of the union for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the union and of carrying out the orders of said governing board: And provided further, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print an edition of the monthly bulletin not to exceed 6,000 copies per month, for distribution by the union during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This appropriation of $100,000 is increased $15,000 over that carried by the present act. Will the gentleman inform the committee—because we are all more or less interested in the activities of the Pan American Union—as to the cost of maintenance of that association, the amount that our Government contributes, and the amount the other associated Governments contribute for maintenance of that work?

Mr. FLOOD. I think the other governments contribute about $60,000 and we contribute, up to this time, $85,000. That constitutes the appropriations for the maintenance of the buildings and the force that they have.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why is it increased?

Mr. FLOOD. These officials in the bureau, and there are quite a number of them, have got no increase in salaries in recent years—for a great many years—and the governing board felt, owing to the increase in the cost of living in Washington, that they were entitled to an increase. They do not participate in this $120 or $240 which Congress appropriates, as they are not officials of the United States Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the salary expense of those connected with this bureau here in the city?

Mr. FLOOD. It is something over $100,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. How is it proposed to increase the salary of the respective officials, which entails an additional burden upon the United States of $15,000?

Mr. FLOOD. It is proposed to get about $12,500 from the other Governments, making something like $27,500, and that will be apportioned among the employees.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any information as to what salaries the officials are receiving under this new schedule of estimates?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Barrett appeared before the committee——

Mr. STAFFORD. What salary does the director receive today?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Barrett—I think his salary is $10,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. And it is proposed to increase it to what amount?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think it is proposed to increase his salary at all.

It is supposed to increase the salary of the clerks of different grades. They have some interpreters and clerks and people of that kind in the bureau. Mr. Barrett filed a very lengthy statement, which was printed as a part of the hearings. I do not think he gave a detailed statement there of the salaries as they are now or as they would be, but he did state that during all this period of the increase in the cost of living the salaries of the clerks and laborers and officers of that bureau have not been increased, and the governing board thought they ought to be increased, and this suggestion was taken up. And if we get the appropriation, the ministers or ambassadors from the South American countries will take it up and get their countries to contribute their proportionate share of the increase.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a pretty liberal increase that is going to be provided if we are not going to increase the salary of the director to any amount.

Mr. FLOOD. I understand that his salary is not going to be increased. The property has been maintained out of this appropriation, and the cost of maintaining that splendid building down there has also increased.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION FOR PROMOTION OF INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

For the contribution of the United States toward the maintenance of the Interparliamentary Union for the Promotion of International Arbitration at Brussels, Belgium, $2,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the committee inform me, if possible, if there are any delegates to this International Interparliamentary Union? Has this body ever sent official delegates? And what is the purpose of it at this time?

Mr. FLOOD. The Interparliamentary Union?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOOD. Every Member of Congress who desires it is a member of it, and every Member of Congress can attend any of its meetings, as can every member of any parliamentary body.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will pardon me, they can become members without the payment of dues, and there are about 185 Members of this House who are members.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I see. As I understand the French Parliament and the English Parliament—I may be wrong—have selected from their bodies certain men——

Mr. FLOOD. That is a different proposition. That is an interallied parliament. This is an organization that existed before the war.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the one I have reference to. Did we at any time send delegates? They met once at St. Louis, did they not?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did we at any time send delegates to that union?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], who, I think, was chairman of that convention, can tell you all about it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. A good many of the French and English and Italian members told me that this body took no interest in this Interparliamentary Union, and they were complaining of that fact.

Mr. FLOOD. Well, we have an appropriation in this bill to provide for a meeting in this country.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman from New York desire an explanation?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will give him in a few words the history of the organization. In 1888 certain members of the French and English Parliaments met in Paris and organized an association known originally as the Interparliamentary Union for the Promotion of Arbitration. The title was so long as to be awkward, and it was reduced to Interparliamentary Union. That organization has been actively engaged ever since 1888 in promoting arbitration and the justiciable settlement of international disputes. As to the central bureau, the Government of Italy is an adhering and supporting member, and so are France and Great Britain, and before the war Germany and Austria and other countries as well. Before the war a central bureau was established in Brussels with Mr. Christian Lange as secretary. I am not certain on this point, but I think that each of these Governments, with the exception of Austria-Hungary, Germany, Bulgaria, and Turkey, have been contributing during the whole war to keep up the organization. There has not been a meeting of the union since 1913, which was held at The Hague. There was to have been a meeting in Sweden in 1914 and delegates went, but something happened, as the gentleman knows, and the meeting was not held.

As to delegates, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] said, any Member can go and can be a delegate and participate in the proceedings of the union who cares to go. It would not be possible to get an appropriation to transport delegates to an association of this kind, because it would be too expensive an undertaking with no limitation on the number of delegates who might go.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the purpose of the $2,000 appropriation?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is to help maintain the central bureau. All of these countries in which there is a group of the union make a contribution toward its support. Italy gives not quite so much as the United States—probably about $1,200.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do they have a publication?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I wanted to bring out the facts. The members of the parliaments that I met when abroad complained that we were not sufficiently active in it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the gentleman has confused it with the Interallied Parliament, which was purely for war purposes and restricted to three or four countries.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE.

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1920, $8,000;

For salary of one member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1920, $3,600;

For the payment of the quota of the United States for the cost of translating into and printing in the English language the publications of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, $5,000;

Total, $16,600.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is the item that almost failed in the other body at the last session. I believe it was resuscitated by the close vote of one.

Now, since the illustrious promoter of this item, the Hon. David Lubin, who had his genesis, I believe, in California, has passed to the other land, does the gentleman think there is much need of continuing this appropriation?

Mr. FLOOD. I think the agriculturists of the country think this Institute of Agriculture is of great benefit to them. Our adherence to it is by treaty. The appropriations are made in accordance with the treaty of 1905, signed by ourselves and 40 other powers.

Mr. STAFFORD. What information, may I ask, is furnished to the Government of the United States that is not already possessed by the Agricultural Department?

Mr. FLOOD. Well, it furnishes the farmers of the country with a great deal of information about European methods of marketing, and the suggestions of marketing systems made by the Institute of Agriculture have, as I understand, been adopted by the bureau of markets of a good many States, and I know they hold the institute in very high esteem, and held Mr. Lubin in very high esteem.

Mr ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Is it not a fact that since this bill was framed Mr. Lubin has died?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. And is it not a fact that for many years this has been very largely a one-man undertaking, that one man being Mr. Lubin?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think so. Mr. Lubin, as I understand, went to Rome at his own expense and organized an institute, and then after he had organized it he drew to his assistance the farmers of 41 countries, which countries sent representatives to a conference and made a treaty and established this present Institute of Agriculture. He was put at the head of it. For a number of years, being a man of wealth at that time, he did not ask any salary and did not receive any. Subsequently I understood he lost a good deal of his fortune, and we voted him $3,600. But the institute has developed from the time it was a one-man affair, and I happen to know from agricultural organizations in this country that they hold this institute and the work it does as of very great value to agriculture.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do you know in what estimate it is held by the officials of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Houston, the Secretary of Agriculture, holds it in the highest esteem, as he did Mr. Lubin, and I understand the Department of Agriculture regards the institute as being very beneficial to the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression that all the practical men connected with the Department of Agriculture regard this as merely a useless appendage, of no value whatsoever to the farmers of this country, but merely of value to the founder, Mr. Lubin. Now that he has passed away I suppose there will be an effort made to discontinue this work, because I question whether it has any real value.

Mr. FLOOD. We will have to abrogate the treaty, and I think you will find the farmers of the country, and particularly the organized farmers, will make a great protest against abrogating the treaty, doing away with the International Institute of Agriculture.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the effort made to discontinue it, which was nearly successful in another body last year, will be successful this year. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES AND EXPENSES, UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA.

Judge, $8,000; district attorney, $4,000; marshal, $3,000; clerk, $3,000; stenographer, $1,800; printing and binding opinions of the court, $1,000; court expenses, including reference law books, $9,000.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 15, line 2. This amendment was adopted by the committee, and in some way was omitted from the printed bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the figures "$9,000," on page 15, line 2, insert: "In the settlement of salaries for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, by the disbursing officer to the officials of the United States Court for China the same rate of exchange used in the payment of salaries to consular officials in China for said fiscal year is hereby authorized and approved, these settlements to be made from the total amount for salaries and court expenses for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1918, and June 30, 1919."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think some information should be given as to the reason for this provision.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, for some reason the bill which appropriated the money for the court officials for China, and for the Consular Service as well, omitted to make provision for that court, as it did for the Consular Service, in the matter of the changing rates of exchange in China.

Just before the war the rate of exchange was $2.59 Mexican for $1 American, and it has gone down to such an extent that it is now $1.15 Mexican of silver for $1 American. The State Department of the Government saw that it was impossible for these men to get along on their salaries with this rate of exchange, which cut their salaries more than half. They accordingly paid the Consular Service at an established exchange rate of 43 cents American for $1 Mexican, which they adopted.

Now, according to an order issued by the department, or instruction issued, the United States court officials for China were paid at the same rate as they had always been paid, but when the year was up the Treasury Department refused to accept that rate for the court officials, because they said they had not been specifically mentioned in the bill, as the Consular Service had been, and the consequence is that, although these men have received their money according to the orders of the State Department at the same rate the Consular Service received it, they are now asked to make good that difference, and must do so unless this amendment is adopted.

Now, they were paid, as I say, according to the consular rate. They are all Government officials in the same place, and some of them occupy the very same building. Had not the Treasury Department or the State Department made that mistake and paid them according to the rate which they had established of 43 cents, these men could have gone along and received their salary according to the prevailing rate; but the rate has been falling constantly, and now we would be taking advantage of them, because they had been told that we would pay them according to the rate established by the department, and then later, at the end of the year, we say, "We can not pay you according to that rate because the bill does not provide for it," and then ask these men to go on the market and make good that difference at a very high rate of exchange, now about $1.15 Mexican for $1 American. It would be a very great hardship on them.

In fact, I am more closely in touch with the Attorney General for the court, and he tells me that it would take an entire year's salary to make good this difference, whereas if he had been paid according to the rate which prevailed at the time it would have made a difference of probably $1,500 or $1,600 to him in his salary. The year 1919 was provided for, but the provision was omitted for the fiscal year ending June, 1918. This would simply place the court officials in China on the same basis as the Consular Service and on the same basis they have always been. They have always been paid according to the consular rate of payment, and this is merely to rectify a mistake which Congress made and not penalize them because of an omission by Congress and a misinterpretation or error from the State Department.

Mr. Holcomb tells us in his testimony:

Mr. COOPER. What percentage of loss was there?

Mr. HOLCOMB. When I went there we got $2.59 for each gold dollar, and then it went down to $1.33, and now it is $1.15. If we do not get relief, we will have to buy the silver and pay it back, and that will take about $3,600 gold, one whole year's salary, to repay that, and it was not our fault that the mistake was made. I am penalized every day. I assure you, gentlemen, that the money was taken by the officers of the court under the mistaken idea that they had been taken care of.

It would merely rectify a mistake which Congress made, and pay them according to the consular rate, which they had always been receiving.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in the existing act there is specific provision made for the payment of the exchange?

Mr. LINTHICUM. The rate is established by the department, which is 43 cents American for $1 Mexican. That was provided in the emergency bill or the general deficiency bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any other instances where the conditions cited by the gentleman apply to persons connected with the Diplomatic and Consular Service?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; there are none that I know of.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] mentioned to me a very similar case in Persia.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There are similar conditions in Persia, India, and China, and I am sure that the gentleman will agree with me that in certain other portions of the earth where the silver standard dollar is in vogue the price of silver has been going up rapidly, and therefore relatively the value of the American dollar has been declining, and the condition throughout China and the Orient extends down into the Dutch East Indies and into India. It is even found in Japan, although in a much less degree, because Japan has the gold standard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The silver dollar has been going up in value relatively, and the condition in China is probably worst of all. It has reached a point where unless something like this is done our men there absolutely can not live on their salaries. The judge instead of getting $8,000 will be getting $4,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the effect of this amendment is retroactive, that the future is provided for.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes. The Department of State, recognizing that situation, took care of the diplomatic and consular officers in China and elsewhere out of post allowances, and under the impression that the provision of law authorized them to take care of the court officials in China, because the appropriation is contained in the diplomatic bill, they extended the same privileges to the court for China, but later found that they had no legislative authority for doing so, and this is to validate their action. I am sure everyone in possession of the facts will agree with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] that this is a very necessary and essential thing to do. It means almost the very life of the judicial tribunal in China. If after two or three years there comes to be a parity between the silver dollar and the gold dollar, of course this will not be necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, as I understand, this amendment takes care of a condition that existed some years ago.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is entirely true, and the law now takes care of their salaries for this year and the year to come.

Mr. LINTHICUM. This does not involve any additional appropriation. These men have already received the money, and they received it according to the rate established by the department. Had they been told at that time that they were not entitled to it the difference in the rate at that time was not so great; but now to compel them to turn back this money which has already been paid them will be a great hardship, because they will have to go into the market and purchase it at the present low rate of exchange, which will penalize them for acting in good faith with the department. It will penalize one man $3,800, because the department had misinformed him. The gentleman from Wisconsin was asking whether there were any other cases. I do not think there is any other case on record or in existence where the department has told these people that they were entitled to it when they were not and then demands repayment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is correct in that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And where the department afterwards told them they were not entitled to it and asked them to refund.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I thought the gentleman's query was in reference to the recent rise in the value of silver.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This is the only case of this kind that I know of.

Mr. STAFFORD. My inquiry was directed to the point whether this would be a precedent for other cases.

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; there are no other cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The judge of the said court and the district attorney shall, when the sessions of the court are held at other cities than Shanghai, receive in addition to their salaries their necessary actual expenses during such sessions, not to exceed $8 per day each, and so much as may be necessary for said purposes during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, is hereby appropriated;

Total, $29,800.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I notice that the committee have raised the allowance that may be paid to the judge and the district attorney when absent from their stations from $5 a day to $8 a day. I am unacquainted absolutely with conditions existing in China, but I was under the impression that living there cost much less than in the United States.

Mr. FLOOD. The information we get is that it is the most expensive place in the world just now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Even more so than the city of Washington?

Mr. FLOOD. I understand very much more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then you ought to double this amount if that is the case. That is a pretty strong statement to make. On what authority does the gentleman make such a strong statement, that the cost of living in China is greater than in the city of Washington?

Mr. ROGERS. I should like to refer the gentleman to page 139 of the hearings, where there is printed a report from one of our consular inspectors who had at that time just returned from a tour of inspection in the Far East. He says:

No inspector can now travel in the Far Eastern inspection district without paying from his own pocket one-third or more of the actual necessary and unavoidable expenses of subsistence for himself and really one-third of the total expense, exclusive of telegrams. He is limited to an average of United States $5 per day for subsistence (in making which the days not spent in hotels are not allowed to be used in computing the total number of days to be averaged). This in a district where at almost no port can three meals, a bed, and a bath be obtained for less than United States $7 to United States $8, and cost United States $15 to United States $25 at many of the larger places. Hotels at Kobe and Yokohama now charge from United States $7.50 to United States $10 (15 to 20 yen) per day, at Shanghai United States $16.20 (Mexican $18) and up, and at Hongkong United States $18 to United States $22 (Mexican $20 to Mexican $24). In addition, one has necessary tips and laundry to pay, as well as numerous other charges, which the auditor classes as subsistence.

I have in my hand a letter which came to me yesterday from the judge of the United States Court for China. I may say that it is a tribute to the postal service of some country—it may be China's or it may be Mr. Burleson's—that that letter, which is dated October 11, 1918, reached me yesterday after a transit of three and one-half months from Shanghai.

Mr. STAFFORD. Give the credit to the man in America who deserves it so much.

Mr. ROGERS. Judge Lobingier writes:

It is impossible at the present time to journey in China at an expense of $5 a day. I have just returned from holding a special session at Tientsin, where my expenses, with the most rigid economy, will amount to more than three times that figure.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAYMENT TO THE GOVERNMENT OF PANAMA.

To enable the Secretary of State to pay to the Government of Panama the eighth annual payment due on February 26, 1920, from the Government of the United States to the Government of Panama under article 14 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, $250,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This annuity of $250,000 for Panama raises the question as to the business transaction of the building of the Panama Canal. Has the chairman any figures as to the amount of business that goes through the canal and as to its profits?

Mr. FLOOD. I have not.

Mr. FESS. I do not want to take up the time of the House on this matter of information, but I was wondering whether the business is growing or not.

Mr. FLOOD. I have no information in regard to it whatever.

Mr. FESS. I will take no time, then. I thought the chairman might have the figures. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The appropriation of $15,000 for the payment of compensation to and the necessary expenses of the representative or representatives of the United States on the International Commission of Jurists, organized under the convention signed at the Third International American Conference August 23, 1906, approved by the Senate February 3, 1908, and ratified by the President February 8, 1908, for the purpose of preparing drafts of codes of public and private international law; and for the payment of the quota of the United States of the expenses incident to the preparation of such drafts, including the compensation of experts under article 4 of the convention, made in the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and extended and made available for the fiscal years 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919, not having been expended, is hereby extended and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman what progress has been made in regard to codifying international law, as provided for in this paragraph?

Mr. FLOOD. No progress has been made in the last three years. The work has been entirely suspended. The conference has done no work since the European war began.

Mr. FESS. The chairman will remember that a meeting was held by representative international lawyers, and they recommended some sort of a code, and when we published a compilation of documents on the restraint of trade that particular recommendation was included in the document. Secretary Lansing told me in a conference over the matter that it had not received the approval of the State Department; in fact, he had never seen it, and therefore it could not bear the insignia of our own country. I was wondering whether that was the product at all of this proposed expense.

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. FESS. That seems to have been merely voluntary.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I was out of the House a short time, and I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if any provision is made for the increase in the salary of consuls?

Mr. FLOOD. We have just got to it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Did the committee follow the recommendation of the State Department?

Mr. FLOOD. The committee did.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALARIES OF THE CONSULAR SERVICE.

For salaries of consuls general, consuls, and vice consuls, as provided in the act approved February 5, 1915, entitled "An act for the improvement of the foreign service," and for economic assistants at salaries of not more than $5,000 each per annum, $1,974,500. Every consul general, consul, vice consul, and, wherever practicable, every consular agent shall be an American citizen.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 21, line 3, strike out the words "wherever practicable."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HASTINGS). The Clerk will report the amendment. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin insist on his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I may and I may not.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. That there is legislation in the paragraph not provided for in existing law. If it will accommodate the gentleman from Tennessee for me to make the point of order now, I will do so. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is quite willing that I do not press the point of order at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have not withdrawn my point of order, Mr. Chairman. I wish to inquire as to these new positions of economic assistants as provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. FLOOD. They are to be expert commercial men to be attached to the consulates in different parts of the world for the purpose of advancing our trade in those countries. There are 25 of them provided for in the bill. They perform a similar function in the consulates that the commercial attachés do at the embassies.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, may I interject a suggestion there? I understand the consular agents are appointed by the consul general. They are appointed in any town where there is no consul and where it is necessary that there should be some representative. That is what a consular agent is. The gentleman is asking about page 21, is he not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Line 1, economic assistants.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this work of the development of our foreign commerce is lodged with the Department of Commerce. In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill authorization is made for the employment of a number of additional commercial agents. There should not be duplication of work. It is true that the Consular Service performs some work of aid in the expansion of our foreign commerce; but there should not be any duplication of work, nor should there be any rivalry between two departments of the Government. We have the assurance of the Secretary of Commerce that there is no rivalry, so far as the heads of those departments are concerned. It is a great work that is being performed by the Department of Commerce. A million dollars nearly is being expended under the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Because I believe there should be no overlapping of activities, no duplication of work, I am going to insist upon the point of order to that part of the paragraph—and for economic assistants at salaries of not more than $5,000 each per annum.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires me to withhold the point of order for a moment I shall do so.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I was connected with the Consular Service before entering Congress, and I have always taken an interest in legislation affecting that service. While it is quite true, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] states, that the Department of Commerce has its representatives in various foreign countries, I believe, in all seriousness, the work recommended by the State Department is vitally important and will be a splendid investment. The Department of Commerce, for instance, had, when I was in the Orient four years ago, one commercial attaché for all of China, a country larger in extent than America, with more than 400,000,000 of people. The task to be performed by one man was absolutely out of the question, and we had a very capable man in that division and still have, but it was impossible for him to care for all the commercial interests in that section of the world. There will be no duplication of work if this plan so well worked out by the State Department is carried forward. There will be cooperation between the Department of Commerce and the State Department. We have not given the Department of Commerce a sufficient force of men to cover all foreign countries where we are going to seek to extend American trade with our new and modern merchant marine which we propose to establish and maintain for the advancement of the business interests of America. The State Department and the Department of Commerce will act jointly in this matter, and will place these new officials where they will render needed and valuable service. Knowing as I do the Director of Consuls, Mr. Wilber J. Carr, I want to say that there is not a better equipped or more conscientious official in the service of the Government. I have visited the State Department with a view of looking into the program which they propose to inaugurate if this legislation is going to be granted, and I appeal to the gentleman from Wisconsin not to insist upon his point of order. I do so realizing that if he understood as I understand, and had made an examination as I have, there would not be in his mind the slightest doubt that this proposed legislation is for the benefit of our country. I have always found the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] open to reason, and I sincerely trust that he will let this legislation go forward. I am about to close a 10-year service in this House——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I am in the same position as the gentleman in that respect, with a little longer service to my credit.

Mr. AUSTIN. No more important piece of legislation in the way of an amendment to an appropriation bill has ever been proposed to Congress than this. I am in earnest about this, and I hope that the gentleman from Wisconsin will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is not my privilege to lay claim to the parentage of any legislative child. Nevertheless the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, as carried in the legislative appropriation bill, has received my close study ever since I have been a member of the subcommittee reporting that bill. It is a subject very dear to my heart, and I want to see that bureau increase in its activities. Because of my interest in it, because of my study—and I have studied it closely—and because I believe that this work is merely duplication and will overlap——

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman reserve his point of order for a moment? To what does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order to the language—and for economic assistants at salaries of not more than $5,000 each per annum.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I send to the desk, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 3, after the word "and" strike out the words "wherever practicable."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I had above five years' experience in the Consular Service a good many years ago. It has been my experience that wherever we have had a consular agent not a citizen of the United States the work was not performed to the best interests of this country. It is very frequently abused, because it is used to further personal or social ambitions. I know the chairman will tell me that it is very difficult to find American citizens to go to small places as consular agents because there is no salary and the fees in some places do not amount to much. I believe it has been the practice to detail clerks to such small places and appoint them consular agents. That is one way of getting around it. If the place is so unimportant that we can not afford to pay a man, let us have nobody there. I am very strong for keeping everybody who is not a citizen of the United States out of the Consular Service. I would even go as far as messengers and clerks. I can not understand why we should have a consular representative in a foreign country who is not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, the committee considered that very carefully. The committee has done a great deal to Americanize the entire Consular Service, but the committee did not think, and the State Department does not think, it would be wise in reference to these assistants to so legislate that it would be impossible at any time to employ a person who was not an American citizen, and it does not do so whenever it is possible to get an American citizen; but there are a few cases when it is not possible, and therefore we leave those words "whenever practicable" in there. The committee has done everything in its power to Americanize the entire consular system.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. These words "wherever practicable" apply only to consular agents; that runs to the port——

Mr. FLOOD. It may.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then, in every instance, why should we be represented in any part of this world by any man who is not an American citizen?

Mr. FLOOD. There are some ports where it could not be possible to get an American citizen to go upon the salary given them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then abolish the office.

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman desires to abolish these offices, let him make a motion to abolish them.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman in seeking to Americanize in every possible way our Consular Service. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has gone a little further, each year I have been on the committee, to bring about that entirely beneficent result. I have been somewhat active in the several steps. This year we are taking a step further than we have ever taken before in that for the first time we absolutely require that every vice consul shall be an American citizen. Previously we had stipulated that "whenever practicable" every vice consul or consular agent should be an American citizen. We have not hitherto made it absolutely a rule of law in the appointment and retention of vice consuls. This bill for the first time does that. I very much hope that it will be possible in the immediate future to make every consular agent representing this country abroad an American citizen. Most of them are American citizens now. I should say about one-third of them are still foreigners. This bill in this very item which we are now discussing provides for the creation of 150 career vice consuls. If the gentleman will look at the hearings on page 108 he will find a tabulation submitted to the committee by Mr. Carr, showing how the appropriation asked for in this bill of nearly $2,000,000 for consular salaries is to be divided. The last three items of the tabulation show that there are to be 50 vice consuls of class 1 at $3,000, 50 vice consuls of class 2 at $2,500, and 50 vice consuls of class 3 at $2,000. Those vice consuls are to be placed in the positions which are now pretty generally occupied by consular agents. The intention of the State Department and the intention of the committee is that these men shall supersede non-American consular agents in every post where there is a real volume of business, where there are American interests of any importance.

At the same time there are some posts where American trade is of such small magnitude and of such small consequence that it would not be economically desirable, it would not be advantageous from a business point of view, to appoint a $2,000 or a $2,500 or a $3,000 vice consul and put him in that position to administer the very small volume of American trade which is there. I have taken from the latest register of the Department of State some of the places where the volume of business done by our consular agents is very small. Take the case of Caldera, Chile, where the total annual volume of fees taken in by our consular agent there for the fiscal year ended June, 1917, was $92. At Cruz Grande, in Chile, the annual volume of business was $91; at Camaguey, Cuba, $42,50; at Boulogne sur Mer, $67.50; at Dunkirk, $48; at Dieppe, $92.50; at St. Vincent, in the West Indies, $69; at Freemantle, Australia, $71.50; at Townsville, Queensland, $78.50; and at Flushing, Netherlands, $27.50. When we come to Oaxaca, Mexico, the volume of business was $2.50 a year, and at Bloemfontein, South Africa, there is a magnificent total for the year of $1.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes. I want to ask him some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. Now, that, I say, is the total volume of business done at the several places. The salary, the munificent salary, which our consular agent receives is in each case one-half the amount that I have read. Those places are not unique. I could enumerate a number of others where the total fees collected are less than $100, and where the consular agent's salary is consequently anywhere from 50 cents to $50. Now, under those circumstances I think the Committee on Foreign Affairs feels, and I think this committee would agree that it would not be a wise, businesslike policy, while entirely in accord with the purpose of the gentleman from New York, that we should lay down as a rigid rule that every one of those people must be replaced by a permanent official at a salary of $2,000 or more.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield.

Mr. TEMPLE. Speaking of the volume of business, does that mean the total volume of business done by American citizens or the total value of fees collected by the consular agent?

Mr. ROGERS. The latter is what I should have said. The figures read represent the fees taken in at the several places I have enumerated.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Those fees are constituted from consular invoices, bills of lading, applications for passports, and so forth. Now, is it not true the consul's business is the protection of American trade and to look out for opportunities for American capital, and is it not true that a consular agent has a district sometimes as large as that of a consul general?

And is it not also true that he has access to commercial reports and confidential information concerning our industry and commerce? And is it not dangerous and against the interests of American industry to have them representing the business interests of this country in foreign ports?

Mr. ROGERS. That is rather an elaborate question, but I would say, generally, the answer is "Yes." At the same time the alternative, when we get to a post of the type I have enumerated, is either that we shall have nobody or that we shall have a foreigner. It would not be wise to close those agencies. My opinion is that it would be a misfortune to the United States to maintain a foreigner there a moment longer than is necessary. But you can not get an American citizen to go out there for any sum which is at all commensurate with the importance of the place. We are wisely Americanizing the service very rapidly, but it can not be done in a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I wish to say a word in favor of this amendment. It was my privilege at one time to appoint seven of these consular agents. Four of them were Arabs, who could not speak a word of English. Now, you can imagine, gentlemen, very readily, I think, how anybody would feel that wandered up to an American consular office, seeing the eagle sign there, and finding an Arab that could not speak a word of English in charge of the American interests. In the first place, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] suggested, it is a dangerous thing to do. You do not know who they are. They might be friends of America and they might not be. They have access to American records. I know of one instance where a man spoke good English and was a member of a nation as civilized as ours, who was at Port Said, and, as a matter of fact, his interests were absolutely opposed, diametrically opposed, to those of American business men, and he would injure our business undoubtedly. I visited him and suggested his removal to the department. You can not follow these fellows around and check them up. It is a dangerous proposition. There is only one way for this Republic to do, and that is to put American citizens on guard and make them understand what America is. All that business can be done by correspondence with the consul, a little way off. That matter can all be handled. If you lost a little business down there, you would not lose as much as if you were to put your business in improper hands.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I do not agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] in reference to this amendment.

I have contended here in Congress for an increase in the salaries of consuls and consular clerks and for substituting Americans for foreigners wherever they were available in the Consular Service, and for the last 10 years the Committee on Appropriations and the State Department have been working out that solution.

Now, when I was appointed consul to Glasgow, Scotland, the vice consul for 20 years was a native of Great Britain. I immediately made an investigation and found an American citizen and had him appointed as vice consul. But in that consular district there were two consular agencies located where we were without American citizens, and it meant either the reappointment or the continuation of the men in the service with good records or an abolishment of the offices. And the official fees were insignificant. They would not sustain an American, and no American could afford to leave the United States to accept the appointments.

Mr. LITTLE. Permit me to suggest that the gentleman's experience was among people of the same type as our own, and it was much easier to find somebody of a sympathetic character there than in Siam or in South America or Mexico. Foreigners acquire disrespect for America by seeing such people in charge as I have referred to. In your district the consular work would have been done through your office.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think not; not without great inconvenience, trouble, and expense to the interested parties.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going to abolish consular agencies, then we must provide an appropriation which will carry salaries which will justify Americans in accepting appointments or practically do a great hardship to people who are interested and must use this service. And we certainly ought not to do this without the recommendation of the State Department, charged with the responsibility for this service.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be unwise to adopt this amendment. This bill is carrying a well-worked-out plan of the State Department for the reorganization of the Consular Service, and that plan provides for the absolute abolition, as soon as it can be accomplished, of these consular agents. They propose to increase the service by 150 vice consuls, who are to take the place of the consular agents; but that may take some months after this law goes into effect, and during that time it is best to leave the consular agents where they are, whether they are American citizens or not. They have in the service now 127 consular agents, many of whom are not American citizens. The very purpose of this increased appropriation is to get rid of all these people and authorize the State Department to appoint 150 vice consuls, who will take the place of the consular agents. Therefore, until that plan is worked out, it is unwise to hamper the administration in the carrying out of the plan which they have carefully and laboriously formulated. I hope that the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, there are a good many men in the service who are growing old, and as they grow older they become inefficient. The promotions in the Consular Service are rather slow, and we have, perhaps, in some important posts now men who are beyond 75 years of age. What is the policy of the department as to getting more active and younger men in these higher places and putting aside the older men who are not able to do the work?

Mr. FLOOD. They are under the civil service, and there is no law compelling them to retire and you can not put them out.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As time goes on we will have in Paris, London, Rome, and all these places men who have grown old in the service and who can not do the work. Does not the gentleman believe some provision should be made for these men so that we can promote those who are able to do the work?

Mr. FLOOD. It might be wise to give the Department of State the right to retire them at a certain age.

Mr. AUSTIN. We can take care of them under the general bill that is now pending in Congress, to provide retirement for the civil employees of the Government. This is another reason why that measure should pass.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the department will be embarrassed on account of the existing situation.

Mr. FLOOD. We have nothing in the bill on that subject.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall detain the House for only a few minutes, and I must apologize in advance for a brief reference to a proposed item in this bill which the House has predetermined not to entertain. I refer to the matter of legation buildings. Fifteen years ago I proposed such a bill. In fact, I introduced the bill in two or three Congresses, and I believe it would be wise to enact it now. I think we ought to provide reasonable homes for our diplomatic representatives abroad. I do not believe that we ought to provide palaces, because a man with an income limited to $17,500 a year, the salary of an ambassador, would hardly be comfortable in a $500,000 residence, and I oppose that feature of the bill. But we ought to make some provision for them, because it is scandalous and inexcusable, in my judgment, that these high diplomatic positions can only go as a rule to gentlemen of means who contribute largely to presidential campaign funds. Without legation buildings poor men, however talented, can not generally accept high diplomatic appointments. The sin rests on both parties alike. There is no difference in that respect. It is a scandalous fact that these great appointments to exalted diplomatic rank should go to the heavy contributors to campaign funds.

And, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word with regard to the intimations I have heard in this debate that we should have a trained diplomatic corps. I am inclined to think that we ought to have a permanent consular force, but I do not believe we ought to have a permanent diplomatic corps. If we do, we are going to find that under the meager salaries paid to the subordinate officers in the Diplomatic Service we will soon have promoted from the positions of secretary and attaché only the sons of very rich men, and then we will get them in these places even without contributions to campaign funds. I do not believe in it. Moreover, my observation and limited experience in travel are that the underofficers in the diplomatic stations are not usually men preeminently qualified for the positions. They know the conventions, of course, and are, I dare say, courteous to their own caste, but too frequently not so to their traveling fellow countrymen. Some of the greatest representatives that we have ever had abroad were men without diplomatic training. Benjamin Franklin had never had any. Adams had never had any of any consequence, nor had Phelps nor Bayard nor Lowell, to come down to more recent times. Yet these are names that have shed luster on the Diplomatic Service of this country. I am pleased to say, Mr. Chairman, that we have recently had appointed to the post of ambassador to London a man of a very high order of ability, with whom many of us are personally acquainted.

I believe that the standard fixed by Adams and Lowell and Phelps and Bayard and others at the Court of St. James will be maintained in every respect by John W. Davis, recently appointed. [Applause.] I know him to be a man of high character. We all know him to be a man of great ability. He has already made for himself a position as a speaker, and a gracious, agreeable personality, and in his care the affairs of our Government of a diplomatic nature will be just as safe as they ever were in the hands of anyone. I am told that a distinguished citizen of the State of Ohio, formerly a Member of this House, will soon retire from the Diplomatic Service. I refer to our present ambassador to France. I regret that circumstances have made it appear necessary to Mr. Sharp to retire from that position at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Most of us recall with some degree of pain the severe, almost insulting, criticism that was made by his enemies when he was suggested for that position. I would not take a single leaf from the laurels gathered by his predecessor, but most of us who have watched the career of our former colleague in Paris will agree that the occupancy of that great position by Mr. Sharp has been with as much usefulness and as much distinction and as much credit to the country as that of any of his predecessors. [Applause.] He is a typical, high-class, clear-headed, common-sense American citizen, the sort of representative a republic should have, a man of ample dignity; he is educated, and I congratulate the country and I congratulate—I was going to say the Democratic Party, but it is not a political position—I congratulate the people and all political parties that we have had such a diplomatic representative of the American citizenry at Paris during these trying times, and I think we feel that there is a loss to the Diplomatic Service and to the country when he retires. [Applause.] He has conducted himself with tact and dignity, and he will retire with honor.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPENSES OF CONSULAR INSPECTORS.

For the actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses of consular inspectors while traveling and inspecting under instructions from the Secretary of State, $25,000: Provided, That inspectors shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence, itemized, not exceeding an average of $8 per day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I think this ought to become a law, and I trust that my colleague will not raise the point of order, for this reason: The testimony before our committee as to the expenses over there that these inspectors have to meet was astonishing. For example, hotels in Kobe and Yokohama, Japan, now charge $7.50 to $10 a day in United States money, which is gold. At Shanghai they charge $16.20 a day to $18 a day in gold. At Hongkong they charge $18 to $22 a day in gold.

Mr. STAFFORD. That information was called to the attention of the House in connection with the item providing for an increase of allowances for the judge and the district attorney to the court of the United States in Shanghai.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was at my office at that time and did not know of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I rose to make an inquiry as to the peculiar phraseology of this allowance. It is not in the customary phraseology "not to exceed $8 a day," but "not to exceed an average of $8 a day." I do not recall a similar authorization where we have granted a per diem allowance for expense of subsistence.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. My understanding is that in some places they can possibly get subsistence and accommodation for less than $8 and in others you can not get it for less than twice that sum. Therefore the committee used the word "average."

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose under this authorization it is the purpose to allow an inspector a greater amount than $8 a day if for the year it does not average more than that amount. Has the gentleman any information as to what the average expenditure is?

Mr. FLOOD. Let me say that the average expenditure for these gentlemen, especially those in the East, would be more than $8 a day. Those in Europe and South American countries would be $8 a day, probably.

Mr. STAFFORD. In one bill, the legislative, we are only authorizing a per diem expenditure of $5 a day. Here you authorize not a per diem of $8, but an average throughout the year of $8.

Mr. FLOOD. These gentlemen do a very valuable work, and it is difficult to keep them in this branch of the service. They are on the move all the time. Eight dollars a day was thought to be enough to cover their expenses and not too much in all the countries except the East, and the department insisted on $10 a day in that section. The men are constantly on the go and want to get out of this branch of the service and get into the regular Consular Service. They have five men and they want to add two more to them. They are very efficient men and they want to keep them there. They have to go into their salaries to help pay their expenses.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Virginia will remember that Mr. Carr in that connection told the committee of one of these inspectors, by the name of Fuller, who had not had but one leave of absence, and that a very short one, in five or six years; that he had been traveling all the time and been imploring the department to give him a place somewhere where his labors would be reduced. He also said the system of auditing the accounts of these inspectors is so exceedingly strict that it is almost impossible for them to work any fraud on the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, impressed with the information furnished by my colleague, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers and consular assistants and officers of the United States Court for China in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $700,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I reserve all points of order. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Under this provision, as I understand it, it is the purpose to add to the laws of the land the proposition to make it possible for the President or the State Department, by his direction I presume, to overcome the difficulties that have arisen among our consuls and diplomats abroad, because of the increased cost of living during the war. That is the purpose, is it not?

Mr. FLOOD. During the war and for the time immediately after the war; yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Is there any legislation now on the statute books upon which this is predicated, or is this new legislation?

Mr. FLOOD. This is entirely new legislation.

Mr. LITTLE. Then it would be out of order.

Mr. FLOOD. It is subject to the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. I reserve that point of order. I want to ask as to the facts. In certain locations, by reason of the war, the American dollar has ceased to have the value it did, and, therefore, a consul or a minister does not get actually the same amount of money that he did before. Is not that the fact? The rate of exchange has changed, in other words. I am reliably informed that the State Department now sees its way clear under statutes which have been passed to assist the consular officers, but not the diplomatic representatives. Does the gentleman consider that under this provision it would enable the President, if he saw fit, to obviate that difficulty and adjust a man's income out of this $700,000 so that it would overcome the decreased value of the dollar?

Mr. FLOOD. A minister, I think, could possibly be embraced within the term "diplomatic officers," but I would say to the gentleman that it is not the policy of the department or of the President to do it, and I do not believe it would be the policy of the House.

Mr. LITTLE. If it is the policy of the President and the House to assist the Consular Service, why not the Diplomatic?

Mr. FLOOD. It is a little different kind of service. It is a business service, a permanent service. Those men go into it for a life work, and the increased cost of living came on them; and if they had no means of their own, many would have to give up their life's work. An ambassador or a minister under our system has not adopted that for his life work. It is true that men in lower grades of the Diplomatic Service probably have, but the ambassadors and ministers are special appointees, to hold for an administration or two administrations. They accept the places with the understanding that they have to bear a certain financial burden in doing it, and are more prepared to meet emergencies.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman realizes that some of them in the smaller appointments are poor men.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; and, realizing that, we undertook to make a provision here so that homes could be built for them. I do not believe that it met with the gentleman's approval.

Mr. LITTLE. That would not assist them. The Government pays the rent now.

Mr. FLOOD. No; it does not.

Mr. LITTLE. I know that it does, because I have been in the service.

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman knows that, he has information that every official in the State Department will tell him is inaccurate.

Mr. LITTLE. I expect that is true, because they have not been there; but every one of them lives in the agency or the consulate that the Government rents for them.

Mr. FLOOD. Every ambassador and minister that we have does that?

Mr. LITTLE. Every consul does, that I ever visited.

Mr. FLOOD. I was not talking about the consuls.

Mr. LITTLE. And it is the same way with the ministers to the smaller countries, or was. The Government rents an office for them, and it is of such proportions that they can live in it. The gentleman is technically correct, that the Government does not rent houses for them, but the Government rents their offices and they live in them, being allowed formerly, and probably now, something like 20 per cent of their salaries for such rent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order, and I desire to offer an amendment——

Mr. STAFFORD. I renew the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, I am keeping it up.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman can not if he offers an amendment. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman is insistent on having this made a permanent authorization, regardless of the existing war.

Mr. FLOOD. Does the wording of the provision make it that?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the phraseology of the paragraph under consideration you eliminate the limitation carried in the existing act—during the pendency of the existing war and for six months after its termination.

Mr. FLOOD. No; that would be a very good amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, if the gentleman is willing to have that incorporated in the bill I withdraw the reservation of the point of order. I believe there should be some limitation.

Mr. RAGSDALE. If the chairman will permit me, does not the gentleman think that so long as this condition of affairs exists abroad by which the American dollar will not buy a dollar's worth that the President of the United States ought to be able to make up that difference in our ministers' salaries, to meet that condition of affairs necessarily changed at the termination of this war or immediately afterwards?

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, the rearrangement of salaries is a matter for permanent legislation. You are attempting that so far as the consular officers are concerned. I believe this bill by increasing the appropriation some $700,000——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, this appropriation was originally intended only for a temporary purpose?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. To provide for an allowance occasioned by the high cost of living occasioned by the war?

Mr. RAGSDALE. And occasioned by the fact that the American dollar abroad no longer buys a dollar's worth in every country in which it is spent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Changes are being made. The price of Argentine wheat in Liverpool is $1.55, and prices are bound to come down in this country and throughout the world, but as this provision was temporary I think it should be continued temporarily; in fact, as the gentleman remembers, it only applied originally to those countries where the war was in progress and to countries contiguous thereto, and then it was subsequently extended. Now, all that is desired is to provide for its application during the pendency of the existing war and then provide thereafter——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Well, suppose the gentleman offers his amendment to that effect.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order, with the understanding it has the approval——

Mr. FLOOD. Is the gentleman going to offer the amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve it for the time being at the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. I understand I have the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. LITTLE. The regular order is that I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. LITTLE. Does the Chair ask me? I am informed the gentleman reserves the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the regular order is demanded, the Chair must rule on the point of order.

Mr. FLOOD. If the gentleman from Kansas desires to offer his amendment——

Mr. LITTLE. If I may be permitted——

Mr. FOSTER. I will withhold the demand for the regular order for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. If I am not permitted to proceed, I shall make the point of order that it is new legislation, and the gentleman can do as he pleases.

Mr. FLOOD. All right; the gentleman can pursue his own course.

Mr. LITTLE. I shall pursue my own course. I am getting tired of this, for every time a new man endeavors to speak I find that anonymous points of order and rules are invoked against him and nobody else. I am going to do a little of that from now on. Now, this will read as follows if my amendment is carried:

To enable the President, in his discretion, and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers and consular assistants and officers of the United States Court for China in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living—and the changes of the comparative values of American money and the money at the post to which they may be assigned, $700,000.

The point I have in mind is Persia. The salary of the minister to Persia is $10,000, paid in Persia. We are told it is paid in gold. That is the law, but it is never paid in gold. What happens is this, that he sits down and draws upon the United States for his salary, at intervals, probably on London, where the account is kept, or formerly was. Then he takes that paper, a draft, and he sells it to the bank. He does not get gold for it. If he got gold he could take it to the mint of Persia and have it minted and get his money.

Mr. FLOOD. What kind of money would he get?

Mr. LITTLE. If he got gold he would get gold money. He could have it minted into Persian money.

Mr. FLOOD. He would have Persian money?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; Persian gold. He says there is a great deal of difference between the purchasing power of the Persian gold and silver money. He draws a bill of exchange and goes to the bank and sells it to the bank. The bank has no account in dollars. The bank puts it into Persian money and he sells it for whatever he can get. Before this war began the normal rate of exchange was such that he would get $11,500 for $10,000, and he would go out and buy with that money. Of course, at the present time the values there have risen five times what they were before, and he can buy only one-fifth as much. It does not happen to the consul there for America; it does not happen to the missionaries there, or to anybody else there except this fellow, who happens to come from the district I represent. Now, here is what happens to him: When he takes his money down he finds the rate of exchange has changed, so that instead of getting $11 for $10 he gets $5.50 for $10. That is the rate of exchange now. In other words, instead of having $10,000 in gold he would get $5,500. Now, the purchasing power of that has diminished five times, and this man is actually getting a salary of $1,000. To equalize, he must draw on us for the equivalent of $10,000 in gold. Now, what I ask is this—it is no favor for him: I just ask that when the department figures out what he should have in relation to others by reason of the 500 per cent increase in the value of things there which he has to pay for, that they also take into consideration whatever they deem is wise in regard to fixing his rate of exchange, so that he will not lose everything he has got. The department is not opposed to this, as he thinks. He was getting along all right until it got down to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, and there they locked horns. He said this Persian minister would not only have to bear that expense himself but would have to pay back several thousand dollars.

Mr. FLOOD. How would he do that?

Mr. LITTLE. Because the Auditor of the Treasury says that he would. He has taken an appeal to the comptroller.

Mr. FLOOD. Where could he draw on the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. LITTLE. He drew on the Treasury.

Mr. FLOOD. For how much?

Mr. LITTLE. For $2,500, I presume, from time to time.

Mr. FLOOD. A quarter?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes. The Auditor of the Treasury has checked it up and says that he is not entitled to draw the way he has been. The exchange is such that he is not entitled to do this. They want him to pay back something like $6,000. He says:

Every other Government having legations or consulates here allows its minister, consul, and other officials full prewar exchange rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks for five minutes additional. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order. I do not like to shut anybody off, but——

Mr. LITTLE. I showed it to the Member and he said he would object to it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to proceed. The gentleman has had five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. I have had five minutes? Mr. Chairman, has my amendment been reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] insist on the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. With the understanding I had with the chairman of the committee, I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. LITTLE. I offer the amendment then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 22, line 8, after the word "living," insert "and the changes in the comparative values of American money and the money."

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. The minister says:

My accounts are settled quarterly by the Bureau of Accounts at the State Department, and they seem to have regularly approved my accounts as rendered. But all accounts must pass muster at the auditor's office in the Treasury Department. It was there that sorrow met me. For two years I had no notice of any settlement of any accounts by the Auditor for the State Department, though I cabled and asked three different times without getting a definite answer, and quite naturally assumed I was correct and my accounts being approved. Imagine my surprise when I got a letter the other day showing that under a governing precedent I was only entitled to whatever $10,000 would buy in the foreign currency, no matter how little that sum was.

It was 5,500 tomans for $10,000.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I would like to ask the gentleman how his amendment could cure the past if it were adopted? I can see how it could cure the future, but I can not see how it would reach back to the past.

Mr. LITTLE. I have taken that up with the comptroller. There has been an appeal made to him, and I am in hopes that he will be reasonable about it. I do not want to leave the affair open any more.

Mr. ROGERS. Does it not strike the gentleman that the language now in the bill and in this paragraph should be construed liberally enough to take care of the case which the gentleman mentioned?

Mr. LITTLE. I want to be sure it will be.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I understand now that this minister or consul who has been writing to the gentleman——

Mr. LITTLE. He says:

Moreover, during all this time, our consul here, in the same building, received his regular settlement of his accounts, which were made out just like mine exactly, and every account of his was approved.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I am asking who he is.

Mr. LITTLE. He says:

Every account of his was approved. He had figured the kran as of a value of $0.0875, the same as I had; but the same auditor, E. D. Hearne, approved his accounts thus, while in mine he fixes the kran value at over $0.18.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is this a missionary that is writing to the gentleman?

Mr. LITTLE. No; I can not yield to the gentleman any further.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I am simply asking the gentleman to tell me by whom the letter was written.

Mr. LITTLE. The minister.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Now, I understand the gentleman's contention is that this American minister's position is, in spite of the law, that he shall draw sufficient money to cover his salary in that country, without regard to the amount of money that it takes. Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. LITTLE. Here is the gentleman's position: Here is $700,000 given in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living. That is the law proposed here. That means that they will give them $700,000. Now, while they are doing that, I ask that this man should have the same treatment that everybody else gets in every country and which our consul gets in that very town. I ask the man be paid $10,000 in gold there or its equivalent in Persian money. You can send him the gold if you wish; if not, buy him enough tomans to equal it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Under this law, is not this discretionary power lodged with the President to take care of the difference that arises by reason of the differences in the rates of exchange in the different countries as to the value of the money?

Mr. LITTLE. No; it is not. But I can not yield further. Here you undertake to give away $700,000, and you leave it to the discretion of the President as to where it will be put. I ask you to leave it in the discretion of the President, which is the department, and I say to you there is a consul and a minister at Teheran, Persia, who are being treated in such a way that the consul gets his full salary and the minister does not get half of his. I ask that you apply the same rule to both of them, and to take into consideration the fact that every foreign minister there and every missionary and everybody who does business there, except this fellow from Kansas, gets his money; every man, he tells us. Now, what is the objection to the gentleman from Kansas getting his money?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. LITTLE. Why?

Mr. FLOOD. I will tell you if you will wait. I hope it will not be adopted because——

Mr. LITTLE. Because he is from Kansas? [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD. Because the rate of exchange in these countries changes almost daily, and we would have to give the State Department a good deal of force to keep up with the fluctuations of exchange. The gentleman is occupying this position: At one time $10,000 American money got him $11,000 in Persian silver. He never returned that extra $1,000 to this country. He put it in his pocket and kept it.

Mr. LITTLE. You might just as well say that he got 11 cows for the $10. The 11 tomans was the same as $10. If he had bought 11 cows you would have him bring back a cow. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOOD. Then why is not 5½ tomans the same as $10? He got $1,000 more than his salary when he exchanged American warrants for Persian money. Over in China at one time a gold warrant for $10,000 would bring the holder $20,000. Now silver has gotten to be rated as relatively more valuable than gold.

Mr. LITTLE. He could not buy any more for $20 silver than for $10 in gold.

Mr. FLOOD. There are men who do not agree with the gentleman about that. They state they were caught coming and going. They said that the silver dollar then probably brought as much as now. If this amendment were adopted we would have to establish a bureau in the State Department to keep up with the fluctuations in exchange in these silver countries, and it does seem to me that we ought not to adopt an amendment of this kind, which inaugurates a new policy, until we know something about it more than we can gather from a letter from the beneficiary of this amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Are you afraid to trust the President?

Mr. FLOOD. No; I am not afraid to trust the President.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order, and the Chair is of opinion that the point is well taken.

Mr. LITTLE. It was agreed, Mr. Chairman, before we began that this whole clause was not proper; that it was subject to a point of order. It was agreed that it was all subject to a point of order; that it was all new legislation. Now you say that my amendment is not germane. You may say that my amendment is new legislation; but to say that my amendment is not germane is pure nonsense. Your amendment is new legislation and mine is new legislation, and mine is germane, and the same point would apply there. And this fact is also observable there, that if the gentleman's amendment is new legislation and is in order, anybody will concede—even the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]—that I could offer an amendment slightly increasing the President's discretion.

Now, there is nothing to this point of order. If he is going to say that I am trying to offer new legislation, of course he has got me; but I do not think there is a parliamentarian in the House who cares to go on record on the proposition that this amendment is not germane. The provision of the bill is that the President can give away $700,000 to make good to our representatives for the losses they sustain by reason of all these troublous days, and that is the provision of my amendment to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been sustained.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. FLOOD: Page 22, line 5, after the word "allowances" insert: "during pendency of existing war and for six months after its termination."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. I withheld my point of order that this was new legislation on the promise that I should have a vote upon my amendment. I rise to make the parliamentary inquiry whether a gentleman in this House is going to make such an agreement, and make it impossible for me to make the point of order, and then refuse to have a vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was no agreement whatsoever made with the gentleman from Kansas as to having the point of order withdrawn with the understanding that his amendment should be considered in order.

Mr. LITTLE. I had an understanding, as I understood it, with the chairman of this committee, that if I withheld my point of order that the paragraph in the bill was new legislation I should have a vote on my amendment.

Mr. FLOOD. I made no point of order on the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. That was my understanding of the agreement, and I think the record will show it.

Mr. FLOOD. There was no such agreement, but even if there was, I made no point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman is forgetting. I think he or some one did make such an agreement in effect.

Mr. FLOOD. Even if the record did show it, I made no point of order against the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] insisting on a point of order in view of what I understood to be an agreement?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have been present during this whole proceeding, and if there was a public understanding on the floor of the House between the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Virginia——

Mr. FLOOD. There was not.

Mr. STAFFORD. That if the gentleman's point of order was withheld no point of order would be made against his amendment, I certainly would not press that point of order. Now, I call upon the record to show whether there was any such understanding. I will not be a party to the violation of any gentlemen's agreement, and if there is such I will not press the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will indulge the Chair just a moment, the Chair can not be cognizant of private conversations.

Mr. LITTLE. There was none. Mr. Chairman, I will rise to a question of privilege in a minute, and we will take up a heap more time than we will in some other way. I said here on this floor that unless I was allowed to have a vote on my amendment I would make the point of order that this was new legislation, and I was allowed to proceed on that theory, the point being withdrawn.

Mr. FLOOD. Nobody acquiesced in that.

Mr. LITTLE. I had an understanding on the open floor, as I recall the conversation, and I think the gentleman will agree with me. I said unless I was allowed to have a vote on my amendment I would make the point of order that this was new legislation.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman certainly said that.

Mr. LITTLE. My understanding was that we agreed that we should go on with that understanding. The point of order against my amendment was withdrawn and I proceeded.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know what the gentleman's understanding was.

Mr. LITTLE. You said so, as I understood.

Mr. FLOOD. I never said a word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the gentleman's statement, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the point of order which I made against the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to withdraw his point of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LITTLE) there were—ayes 10, noes 22.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 10, the noes are 22, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, I feel better, anyhow. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Allowance for clerk hire at consulates; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, $1,200,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here is an increase of $400,000 in this item of $1,200,000 for clerk hire at consulates. Will the chairman of the committee explain the reasons for such an unusual increase?

Mr. FLOOD. Twenty-five new consulates were provided, and there must be a clerk at $2,000 at each one of these consulates. Then it is desired to have these economic assistants. The provision for economic assistants went out on a point of order, but the appropriation was not decreased, and they will be named as consuls. There must be a couple of clerks to assist each one of these men.

Mr. STAFFORD. What salary do you propose to pay these clerks?

Mr. FLOOD. Two thousand dollars. There are 25 at $2,000, and then 150 vice consuls. The provision was to allow them clerks at $1,000 apiece. I do not know that I am right about both clerks of consular assistants getting $2,000. There are 25 new consuls and economic assistants and a couple of clerks to assist each one of these men. That would be 50 clerks, probably 25 at $1,000 each and 25 at $2,000 each.

Mr. STAFFORD. But that would not account for the $400,000 increase.

Mr. FLOOD. There was $175,000 in addition to that amount appropriated in the deficiency bill from the Committee on Appropriations. The real increase in the amount in this bill over the former appropriation was $207,000, and out of this increase of $207,000, with the old appropriation, the department planned to take care of the 225 additional clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, UNITED STATES CONSULATES.

Expenses of providing all such stationery, blanks, record and other books, seals, presses, flags, signs, rent (so much as may be necessary), repairs to consular buildings owned by the United States, postage, furniture, including typewriters and exchange of same, statistics, newspapers, freight (foreign and domestic), telegrams, advertising, messenger service, traveling expenses of consular officers and consular assistants, and economic assistants, compensation of Chinese writers, loss by exchange, and such other miscellaneous expenses as the President may think necessary for the several consulates and consular agencies in the transaction of their business, and payment in advance of subscriptions for newspapers (foreign and domestic) under this appropriation is hereby authorized, $1,168,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Here again we have an increased appropriation of nearly $300,000, but I rise not so much to call attention to the unusual increase as to ask the gentleman whether he has any objection to striking out the "economic assistants," in line 9, page 24?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the words "economic assistants."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase or erection, and the alteration, repair, and furnishing of embassy and legation buildings in the principal capitals of the world, and consular buildings at the principal ports in China, $3,000,000; and the Secretary of State is hereby given authority to acquire, for the purposes specified, as soon as may advantageously be done, suitable buildings and to alter, repair, and furnish said buildings or acquire appropriate sites and to erect and furnish suitable buildings thereon, or to acquire options upon suitable buildings or appropriate sites, as may in his judgment be for the best interests of the Government: Provided, however, That not more than $250,000 shall be expended at any one place, except that in cities containing 1,000,000 or more inhabitants the limit of cost shall be $500,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire to be heard?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FERRIS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14516) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the year ending June 30, 1920, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

At the request of Mr. WELTY, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. LEA of California on account of the sickness of his wife.

HOSPITAL AND SANITARY FACILITIES FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file minority views (H. Rept. No. 879, pt. 2) on the bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanitary facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Has the majority report been filed?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the two requests?

There was no objection.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. Pending that motion, I desire to see if we can not come to some understanding as to the time for general debate. Has the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] any suggestions to make?

Mr. SNYDER. We would like an hour and a half on this side.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman could not make it an hour, so that we can get through with two hours?

Mr. SNYDER. How much time is the gentleman going to use over there?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We will probably use an hour on this side if any is used at all. If none is asked, we would not have to use any on this side.

Mr. SNYDER. I am just as anxious as the gentleman to expedite legislation, but we shall require an hour and a half on this side.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be concluded in not to exceed three hours, one half of that time to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that general debate shall not proceed more than three hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York use some of his time now?

Mr. SNYDER. I have no one ready to proceed to-night.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10663. An act to convey a strip of land on the site of the Federal building at Princeton, Ind.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 23, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill relating to the pay of retired enlisted men serving as field clerks (H. Doc. 1716); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a detailed report of all receipts and expenditures of special contingent funds which the United States collects from nonmilitary residents and transportation companies at Fort Monroe, Va. (H. Doc. 1717); to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. STEELE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3079) to fix the salaries of the clerks of the United States district courts and to provide for their office expenses, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 960), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRIFFIN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13912) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept a correctionary deed for land of new post office at New York, N. Y., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 964), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4017) for the relief of Catherine Grace, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 961), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WELLING, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14584) for the relief of the widow of Joseph C. Akin, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 962), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3536) for the relief of Jose Ramon Cordova, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 963), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SHERWOOD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14894) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and to widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, which said bill is a substitute for sundry pension bills heretofore introduced, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 965), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GAY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is detained on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on account of illness.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], who is detained in committee.

Mr. KING. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MARTIN] are detained on official business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] is detained on official business and that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

LABOR CONDITIONS IN SEATTLE, WASH.

Mr. HITCHCOCK obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska to yield to me for just a moment? I have to attend a meeting of the Committee on Commerce, and I wish to put in the RECORD a couple of telegrams. They are in reference to a statement made by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] the other day in the discussion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. A day or two ago, in the discussion of the pending bill, the Senator from California made a statement based upon a press report in reference to conditions in Seattle. This press report stated that there were soldiers and sailors who were being fed and cared for by the I. W. W., and that they engaged in a riot and demonstration, and so forth. I sent a telegram to the mayor of Seattle under date of January 22, reading as follows:

JANUARY 22, 1919.

OLE HANSON,
Mayor Seattle, Wash.:

Senator JOHNSON stated on floor of Senate yesterday that press dispatch said that after dispersing demonstration of I. W. W.'s at Seattle "it was found that among the outcast I. W. W.'s were soldiers and sailors of the United States, who were being fed by the I. W. W. and who were without resources of money or food" Is this correct? Kindly advise facts immediately.

W. L. JONES.

I have here a telegram from the mayor of Seattle, stating very definitely that this was not correct, that nothing of this kind occurred. I also have a statement from Hon. Harold Preston, chairman of the King County Council of Defense, to the same effect. Without taking the time of the Senate, unless the Senator from California would like to hear them read, I will ask that the telegrams be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do not care that they shall be read at length. I wish to say in explanation that I recited with absolute accuracy dispatches from Seattle which were published in our daily press here, and referred only to what was thus published and what was thus presented by reputable news agencies in the dispatches to newspapers here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is not any question about that. The Senator from California based his statement entirely upon newspaper reports. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I ask that the Secretary may read the two telegrams.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will be very glad to hear them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., January 22, 1919.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Sunday, January 12, meeting advertised on handbills signed Labor Council and Metal Trades Council. Metal Trades Council and Central Labor Council were unaware of meeting and not responsible therefor. Meeting ran peaceably nearly two hours. No disturbance at close of meeting; radicals formed parade behind lumber wagon bearing red flag. Red flag is used here as danger signal on lumber wagon in daytime, same as red lantern is used at night. Against city ordinance to have parade without permit. Officers tried to disperse parade; one of marchers struck captain of police, breaking his nose and blacking both eyes; officers arrested this man, who is an I. W. W., and also arrested 12 others. No soldiers or sailors have been arrested here at any time charged with being against law and order. So far as I know, they are with the authorities for the enforcement of law to a man. All employers, city and county government, have opened places for them on their return; there are no soldier and sailor outcasts being fed by the I. W. W. Different organizations here are taking care of returned soldiers and sailors, but strike now on will make it very hard to find employment for anyone if strike continues for any length of time. Seattle is and has been a peaceable city; there has been no disorder except the fracas of January 12; the strikers are peaceable citizens and are making no trouble. I was elected mayor on the platform of enforcing the law. The people of Seattle will not allow the preaching of the overthrow of the government by force and violence in this city; our statutes make such advocacy felony; not 1 per cent of our people favor any such doctrine. Seattle is a loyal city and will stand by the soldiers and sailors who went to the front. State of Washington and all the cities in the State are beginning great public works to employ labor; we hope Secretary Lane's land plan will carry. Now is the time for the Nation to expend large sums of money on development of land, thus employing labor and providing homes. One hundred million dollars for such a purpose is a joke. Not less than $2,000,000,000 should be considered; there has been as yet no unemployment in this city. Up to the day of the strike labor was in good demand. The city is prosperous and conditions are good. I expect the strike to be settled within a few days, although I have no definite information. Soldiers and sailors should be given a bonus to help care for themselves during readjustment.

SEATTLE, WASH., January 22, 1919.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

Statement in Senate reported in your wire to Mayor Hanson is untrue. Owing to the deplorable neglect of the Government to make proper financial provisions for discharged soldiers and sailors, many of them have come to Seattle in need. County council of defense organize soldiers' and sailors' placement bureau, working in connection with Government employment office. The combination has so far succeeded in placing in positions all or nearly all discharged soldiers and sailors who have applied. The bureau is assisted at the counter by employees of Young Men's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, Jewish Relief, War Camp Community Service, and Elks, paid by their respective employers, who assist and advise and also furnish free beds and meals to needy. A Red Cross agent is also present, who furnishes cash to applicants when needed. The service rendered is efficient as a temporary expedient, and we claim it very creditable to the community. We have heard of no better elsewhere. The I. W. W. or Bolsheviki element here is small though noisy. Their chief stock in trade at the present time is to foment dissatisfaction among discharged soldiers and sailors on account of Government neglect to make proper provisions for them. Council of defense unanimously recommend immediate action by Congress granting bonus to all discharged soldiers and sailors and at least sufficient to enable them to live in comfort during the time of nonemployment will take in many cases.

HAROLD PRESTON,
Chairman King County Council of Defense.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I wish simply to suggest, while it may be that the news account that was carried to us as to a particular instance occurring in Seattle, Wash., may have been inaccurate, nothing could better demonstrate the exact point to which I was alluding than the telegrams which have just been read. Those telegrams show, beyond peradventure of doubt, the great problem of unemployment which is confronting us to-day and which is confronting the city of Seattle, from which these telegrams come. With this great problem of unemployment thus confronting us, I insist that corroborative evidence is added now by these telegrams to the argument which I endeavored to make a few days ago—that our first duty is to the men who come from across the sea, our first obligation is to the boys of America who have made the fight for America, rather than to those who are now living in Europe.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think that the Senator's statement is entirely correct. These telegrams do reinforce the point that he made. The real reason that they were presented was to refute the specific statement of the press to which they referred. They do, however, reinforce the argument which the Senator made.

SUPPLIES OF POTASH.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HENDERSON. A few days ago the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] referred to the situation in this country relative to potash. Since then I have received a letter from the vice chairman of the War Trade Board, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR TRADE BOARD,
Washington, January 21, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HENDERSON: Answering your favor of the 18th instant, we beg to advise that shortly after the Associated Press published the dispatch from Paris announcing that potash would be shipped at once in large quantities from Alsace to this country we cabled the Hon. Vance C. McCormick, who is in Paris, asking for reliable and full information regarding the matter. We have been informed by him that the French Government explains that no potash can be shipped from Alsace for several months, due to the fact that such quantities thereof as can be extracted will be needed for agricultural purposes in France during the coming spring.

The report from Mr. McCormick has been confirmed by the French High Commission in Washington, and so it would seem entirely proper to assume that the United States must depend upon its domestic production for the requirements of the coming crop year. The above information has already been given publicity through the daily press, and in conference yesterday with representatives of the potash industry in this country, with whom the situation was discussed, we learned that a definite program will be adopted which will give the broadest publicity to the fact that the United States must rely upon its own domestic supply for its potash needs for the coming year.

Should you desire further information, please call upon us and we shall promptly respond. Assuring you it is a great pleasure to serve you in this or any other connection, believe us to be, my dear Senator HENDERSON,

Very truly, yours, CLARENCE M. WOOLLEY, Vice Chairman.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, my reason for asking that the letter be read is to give the information to those interested in the potash situation. The farmer should know the true condition, and I take this means of making public the contents of the above letter.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I had not expected to take the time of the Senate in discussing this bill appropriating $100,000,000 to purchase food for people in Europe. Had it not been for the course taken by the discussion, I should not have done so.

Senators are entitled to their opinions as to the wisdom of backing the President and the nations with whom we are associated, not only in the war but in the settlement of the war. They are entitled to their opinions upon the wisdom of backing up the President, who is now in Europe negotiating for peace and making every effort to bring those peace negotiations to an early conclusion. There may be a difference of opinion as to the wisdom or justification for voting these large sums of money for food. To my mind, it is justified; to my mind, when Europe is suffering from the aftermath of the war, when a large area of country is still in turmoil, and is almost without an established government, it is a wise thing for the United States, France, Great Britain, and Italy to do as they have done in the supreme war council—direct the expenditure of $300,000,000 for the purpose of bringing immediate relief to people suffering from starvation and struggling in the work of reinstating governments.

I say it is not only a matter of charity, but it is a matter of good business policy and war expediency to remove from these people, if possible, the evils of starvation and to put them in a frame of mind where they will listen to reason and will support order and government rather than revert to anarchy and disorder. We can not have any peace if Europe is to remain in a perfect welter of disorder and social disturbance and governmental overthrow. The reestablishment of order is the first thing to be considered, and we who eat our three meals a day know very well that starving people can not view things as can people who are not confronted with that danger.

So I say I am willing to take the judgment of the President of the United States, of Mr. Hoover, and of other representatives we have over there, who have already concluded in the supreme war council an agreement by which all these countries are to help bring this relief. Our share is $100,000,000. Are we to hesitate? Are we to discredit our own representatives over there?

Mr. President, I have not been slow in the past from my place in the Senate here to oppose the President when it has seemed to me he was infringing upon the powers and responsibilities of the legislative body. Everyone knows that. You know I have brought myself into discredit at the White House because I have done so, and I do not hesitate even now to exercise my right as a United States Senator to criticize a department when good can come from it. But what possible good, what possible relief, can come from such criticisms and attacks as we have listened to in the Senate during the last few days?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I am only after information in order that I may form a proper judgment on this measure. I am entirely open-minded about it. The Senator from Nebraska refers to the request for this hundred million dollars as being because of the action of the war council. Will he indicate where the information upon that subject may be found?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who is in charge of the bill and who is suffering from a bad throat, has turned over to me certain matters, some of which, I think, has already been read; but the information contained in cablegrams to the Secretary of State from our mission in Paris is to the effect—I will not read it unless the Senator desires me to do so——

Mr. KNOX. I only want the Senator from Nebraska to indicate, so far as I am concerned, where I could obtain the information.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The cablegram states that the supreme council of supply reported to the supreme war council a proposition for the expenditure of $300,000,000 in food supplies for the starving people of Europe.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, will the Senator be good enough to indicate where that cablegram may be found?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will read a part of it to the Senator. I do not know that it has been printed. It is dated "Paris, January 14," and addressed to the Secretary of State at Washington:

The following resolutions adopted Sunday, January 12, at meeting of supreme council of supply and relief were presented yesterday at the meeting of the presiding war council and were formally adopted by the representatives of the allied Governments and the United States.

1. That it is imperative in the interest of humanity and for the maintenance of orderly government that relief should be given to certain European countries. It is provisionally estimated that for the furnishing of this relief till next harvest a minimum sum of $300,000,000 may be necessary apart from the requirements of Germany, which will be separately examined.

2. The council is of opinion that this sum of $300,000,000 should be placed at its disposal by the four associated governments.

3. That the financial representatives of the four governments should consider and make recommendations to meet this expenditure.

4. If these recommendations be accepted by the council, they should then be referred to the respective governments for their approval.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, what strikes me, if the Senator will indulge me for just a second, is that I have before me the hearings and what purport to be the cablegrams that have been received from abroad in relation to the subject, and I do not find that cablegram.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is one of the cablegrams that have been received, nevertheless.

Mr. KNOX. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the fault I find with the hearings—they have not been sympathetic; they have been antagonistic. There seems to have been more desire to develop causes for criticism and scandal than to develop the reasons for this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the Senator gets fairly started in his speech, I wish to call his attention to the fact, which seems to have been generally overlooked, that this is not alone a proposal to feed people in Europe; it is to furnish them foodstuffs and other urgent supplies. I assume that the Senator has that in mind, and that this money, when appropriated, can be expended for anything which in the judgment of the commissioners those people need.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope it can. I am willing to trust the judgment of the American commissioners; and we have got to trust their judgment if we are going to do anything.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Part of it may be used especially for agricultural implements.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It may be used for agricultural implements; I do not know. Mr. President, we are represented in Europe, and our representatives are in concert with the other great powers that have been engaged in this war. They have agreed upon a program, and the question is whether we are going to repudiate our own representatives and set up our own judgment when we know nothing about the matter.

So I say, Mr. President, that I am ready, much as I dislike to do so, to vote the $100,000,000 out of the Treasury. I disliked to declare war; I disliked very much to vote thousands of millions of dollars for war supplies; I disliked very much to be compelled to draft American boys and send them into the war; I disliked to do all those things; but they were necessary for the good of the country, and this is necessary if we are to bring about an early conclusion of peace.

Senators on the other side criticize the President because he does not make haste. How much time has been wasted here in irrelevant attacks on this bill? The administration has been attacked for everything under the sun under the guise of opposition to this bill.

But what I particularly desire to say to-day, Mr. President, relates to what was developed yesterday in the nature of an attack on Mr. Hoover and the Food Administration. I am not going to dodge the issue in any respect. The plain inference, if not the practical charge, made here is that Mr. Hoover's errand in Europe is not what it purports to be, to support the President in aiding him to bring about peace as soon as possible, of which the distribution of this relief is a part, but that his real errand in Europe and his purpose in recommending this bill is to use the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of adding to the profits of the packers. That is the charge.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has the Senator any further information that the Senate does not possess relative to the reasons for asking for this appropriation? The Senator has presented something here that I have not heard about before. He referred a moment ago to certain papers that have been handed to him by the chairman of the committee. I am wondering if there is any other authentic information which the Senate ought to have on this subject?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that that is a fair question. I do not know whether or not the cablegram I hold in my hand from the American mission has been read, but it states in some detail, as much as a cablegram can, the conditions in various countries near to and adjoining Germany, the dire need for food; and perhaps if it has not been read I should read it. This cablegram is from the American mission in Paris; it bears no date, but it was received within a day or two, and gives these details:

On area covered by new appropriation general situation of these countries is that their animals are largely reduced, their crops were far below normal, due to man and animal shortage, ravage, and climatic conditions. The surplus harvest above absolute needs is now rapidly approaching exhaustion, and consequently the towns and cities are in dangerous situation. Our reports shows specifically, Finland, that food is practically exhausted in cities; that while many of the peasants have some bread, other sections are mixing large amount of straw. They are exhausted of fats, meats, sugar, and need help to prevent a renewed rise of Bolshevism.

Baltic States' food may last one or two months on much reduced scale. They sent deputation our minister, Stockholm, imploring food.

Serbia town bread ration down 3 ounces daily in north. Not accessible from Salonika. In south, where accessible, British are furnishing food to civil population. We are trying to get food in from Adriatic.

Jugo-Slavia bread ration in many towns 3 or 4 ounces in all classes. Short of fats, milk, and meat.

Vienna, except for supplies furnished by Italians and Swiss, their present bread ration of 6 ounces per diem would disappear. Large illness from shortage fats, ration being 1½ ounces per week. No coffee, sugar, eggs, practically no meat.

Tyrol is being fed by Swiss charity.

Poland peasants probably have enough to get through. Mortality in cities, particularly among children, appalling for lack of fats and milk, meat, bread. Situation in bread will be worse in two months.

Roumania, bread supply entire people estimated to last another 30 days. Short of fats and milk. Last harvest 60 per cent a failure.

Bulgaria, harvest also a failure. Supplies available probably two or three months.

Armenia already starving.

Czecho-Slovaks, large suffering lack of fats and milk. Have bread for two, three months. Have sugar six months.

We have each country under investigation as to total amounts required to barely sustain life, and their resources to pay. Preliminary investigation by Taylor and staff in connection with allied staffs show total above areas will require about 1,400,000 tons imported food to get through until next harvest, costing, say, $350,000,000 delivered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. By whom is that signed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is signed by the American mission.

Now, what does this show? It shows that our representatives, in connection with those of Great Britain, France, and Italy, have investigated the question and have reached a conclusion. It shows that the other nations have already entered upon that work which we are asked to join in entering upon; and shall we be laggards? Shall we sit here and, because we have criticisms to make of the administration, or political profit to get out of an antagonism, hold up this bill?

Mr. President, I want to refer now to what was brought up yesterday. It is charged that a small packer, Mr. Taliaferro, appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and testified that he believed Mr. Hoover was going to keep his word with the packers; and that is the charge against Mr. Hoover—that Hoover is going to keep the word he gave to the packers with regard to the price of their products.

Now, I have not any use for the packers' combine. I am glad to support any measure which will result in bringing them under Government control, and I know Mr. Hoover is. I am glad to vote for tax bills which will take out of them their unconscionable profits, if they have made any; but if the word of the United States, or of a recognized official of the United States, has been given to the packers and they have acted upon it, it is our business also to see that it is made good.

What did Congress do, Mr. President? Congress passed an act guaranteeing to the farmers of the United States a certain price on their wheat, not only for last year but for this year also; and wheat not yet planted is guaranteed a price of $2.26 per bushel by the act of the Congress of the United States. Why?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is not exactly accurate in that statement. The act of Congress guaranteed the price for 1918 only at $2 a bushel minimum, but it did authorize the President, if in his judgment production would be encouraged, and it was necessary, to publish a proclamation guaranteeing the price of wheat in any year, and the President did do it for 1919.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; it was done under authority of Congress; and why was it done? Not because we wanted to enrich the farmers, because they needed nothing of the sort. It was done for the purpose of winning the war. That guaranty of the price of wheat was put in there as a stimulus to the production of wheat, and the production of wheat was necessary to win the war. That is why we did it.

Now, what did Mr. Hoover do? Hoover, under the powers that were intrusted to him by Congress and the President, was under an obligation. He was under an obligation to use those powers also for the purpose of stimulating all the energies necessary to win the war, and he did it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that when Mr. Hoover, or the men who were in his employ, utilized the powers which were conferred upon them to put independents out of business that was helping to win the war?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; and I deny that he did it.

Mr. BORAH. I say that he did.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I know something of the struggle Mr. Hoover has had with the packing combine in the United States, and I want to say, Mr. President, that if there had not been a Hoover and a Food Administration the packers would have made a great deal more money than they did make.

Mr. BORAH. I say that the evidence is sufficient to show that they did do it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I deny it.

Mr. BORAH. I say they did.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I deny it absolutely, and I say that Mr. Hoover is coming out of this thing vindicated. You have taken him at a time when he is in Europe carrying on his work. He has been vindicated and has won every fight that he has had while he was in the United States. He is a man who comes out of this war, I believe, with a better reputation than any other public official. He comes out clean. He comes out having rendered a great service to the American people. He comes out at the head of a great army of volunteer citizens—men, women, and children—who at his request have saved and skimped and helped him to conserve the food that was necessary to win the war; and I want to say to you that, in my opinion, Mr. Hoover stands in the hearts of the American people equal to any man in the United States. I am very sure that there is no Member of the Senate who, if he ran for President against Mr. Hoover, would be able to poll as many votes as he would poll.

Mr. President, I am aware of the very strong antagonism that certain Senators and others have developed for Mr. Hoover, but the fact remains that from the very day that the war broke out in Europe Hoover has been engaged in self-sacrificing service. He was in London when war broke out, and when the great horde of American travelers, many of them penniless and without credit, came flocking to the American Embassy, Hoover was one of the American citizens who had credit, who went and took the cash out of his bank and himself loaned over $200,000 to the people who came to the American Embassy. He loaned it to hundreds of people, rich and poor, school-teachers and others on vacation trips. Anybody who came there in distress received his money; and then, having shown himself to be not only a public-spirited and patriotic American citizen, but a great organizer, he was put at the head of the great relief work in Belgium and acquitted himself to the plaudits of all the world; and he has followed that up by making a great record in the United States by self-sacrificing service in this war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have not attacked Mr. Hoover.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It sounds to me very much like it.

Mr. BORAH. I said in the beginning that I was not attacking Mr. Hoover's individual integrity. I do not care to go into it. It is not a matter of concern to me. I simply said that the system which he organized was one which I could not approve; and, having organized it upon that basis, I would not vote to turn over a hundred million dollars to him. I said so for reasons given, certain facts stated, and I challenge the Senator to dispute those facts.

Now, I have no objection to the Senator's eulogy upon Mr. Hoover. I do not find fault with it at all. I ask him what he has to say as to the facts which I presented.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to talk about some of the facts that the Senator presented yesterday. That is just what I am coming to.

The changes were rung upon the fact that Mr. Taliaferro, before a committee, testified that he believed Hoover was going to keep his word to the American packers. Now, what was his word? I say that what Congress did with regard to wheat is analogous to what he did with regard to hogs and pork, equally necessary in the war. What he did was almost exactly the same, barring the greater difficulties of the situation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is there not this difference: When the President fixed the price of wheat for 1920 he did so under express authority of law. Did Mr. Hoover have any warrant of law to fix the price of pork at that time?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish the Senator would cite it. I am very much interested in that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am coming to that.

Now, Congress had provided for wheat; but early in the war it was discovered that, while we had a normal crop of wheat, the condition of the hog supply in the United States was very alarming. We went into the year 1917, at the time we declared war, with 7,000,000 less hogs in the United States than we had the previous year—a very material shortage of hogs. What could Hoover do to stimulate the production of hogs? Hoover was the man to whom the administration of the United States and the administrations of the associated nations—Great Britain, France, and Italy—intrusted the power to buy their food products; and he has used that power, as well as the authority given him by Congress, to control the packers to a large extent in the supply of food.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like not to be interrupted for a few minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will kindly cite his authority for the power, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not want to consider quibbles or technicalities. I am talking of broad facts.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is not a quibble.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator can make his own speech as to the authority.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What he has done he has done, and it has been done well, and he has saved the country by furnishing food.

Now, I want to get back to February, 1918; and I want to read the letter addressed by President Wilson to Mr. Hoover on that date:

MY DEAR MR. HOOVER: May I not call your attention to this important point:

There is pressing need of the full cooperation of the packing trade, of every officer and employee, in the work of hurrying provisions abroad. Let the packers understand that they are engaged in a war service, in which they must take orders and act together under the direction of the Food Administration, if the Food Administration requires.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

That came from the President. It called Mr. Hoover's attention to the fact that it was his duty to take supervision over the great food supply of the United States and stimulate it.

As I have said, here was this shortage of 7,000,000 hogs as compared with 1916. What could Hoover do to stimulate that production? There was a German propaganda in this country—at least, there was propaganda which was called German, and I suspect it may have been—which went all over the country, that Mr. Hoover was going to try to hold down the price of hogs to $10; and it was necessary for Mr. Hoover to send out circulars, copies of which I have here, denying that fact, and averring that it was not the policy of his administration to restrict the prices of those products which the world needed below the point where they could be produced.

Mr. Hoover first made his Food Administration organization. He gathered here men from all over the country, skilled in various lines, acquainted with various lines of production. He appointed a food administrator in every State; and I will say that in my State he appointed the man best qualified to discharge its duties, and who sacrificed at it, and did an able service in organizing the people of Nebraska in support of Mr. Hoover; and I presume he did it in other States. He gathered a body here in Washington, numbering at the maximum, something like 1,400 people. He brought in men, advisers from all over the country. He took in also as his advisers the best men in the Department of Agriculture. He took in an officer from the Quartermaster's Department.

He brought in here committees from time to time and producers from every State in the Union—I mean hog producers and cattle producers and agricultural producers generally. He held these meetings repeatedly with these various interests. He brought packers and producers together under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture representatives and his own. The result of those conferences was the development of a plan for the stimulation of the raising of hogs to meet the immediate demand.

There were various plans considered. First, they had to take into account the price of hogs, the price of corn, when the price of wheat was raised, established by the guaranty of Congress; and the effort was made to use various substitutes. We all remember how the price of corn advanced. The hog producers first averred that they would be satisfied with the ratio of 13 to 1; that is, 13 bushels of corn to 100 pounds of hog. It was considered that that would be a fair ratio. But then other changes came in which made that difficult to maintain.

At the first meeting which took a definite conclusion there were something like 50 or 60 persons present. It has been said that it was behind closed doors, but it was a meeting of packers and hog raisers and representatives of the Agricultural Department and provision men and Mr. Hoover's own representative. The result of that first conference in October, 1917, when they had this shortage of 7,000,000 hogs, was to establish a certain price which ought to be paid at the stockyards by these packers for the hogs that they bought; that is to say, it was said that the minimum price—I think it was 15½ cents per pound, live weight—should be paid for hogs in order to induce the farmers of the country to increase the supply.

Now, as the purchaser of the products from the packers, Mr. Hoover was in a position to say to them, "You shall pay 15½ cents per pound for those hogs, live weight." When that word went out to the country the result was a stimulation of the production of hogs, and from month to month the packers paid those prices, and from month to month Mr. Hoover, as the representative of three or four of the greatest nations in the world, paid the packers for their products.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska has very correctly stated what occurred in the fall of 1917. Of course similar arrangements were made throughout subsequent months. But what I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska is this: If hogs are worth $15.50 a hundred, how much is the packing-house product worth? In other words, did the packers sell the products and derive a greater profit from the sale of the products than they ought to have done?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will come to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator will.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Congress did not intrust Mr. Hoover with power to control the prices of packing-house products. He could not do it. All that he could do was through his power as a purchasing agent to say what he would pay for certain products, namely, these food products. He did have some power which he exercised to limit the profits that the packers could earn upon food products, and he did it. He could not limit the profits they made on their by-products. Therefore he could not control their total profits in any way at all. All he could do was to say how much they could make on their food products, and he did it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did Mr. Hoover have authority, or did he not, to license the packers and prescribe the terms upon which they could do business?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He did as far as food products were concerned, and he did it. He limited their profits to 9 per cent on food products, but he could not tell what they should make on glue.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that Mr. Hoover did not have the power to extend the license to their entire business?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. He did not have any jurisdiction over it.

Mr. BORAH. Where is the power which confined his operation or his jurisdiction to food products? He could take in their entire business under the license system just the same as he could take any part of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I will leave the Senator to struggle with his technicalities. The fact was that Congress intrusted Mr. Hoover with the power. There was a great deal of question how far the power went, and many of the Senators on the other side who have been attacking him objected to the very power that Congress vested in him, and limited it.

There was a limitation on the power, but he exercised it in good faith. He told the packers practically that they must pay, to begin with, 15½ cents a pound, because he had to have the pigs. He told them they could not earn more than 9 per cent on their capital in the production of their food products. That is as far as he could go, and he did it.

Mr. Hoover is about through with the packers, and when the American Congress undertake to handle the great packing interests of the country they will probably find, as Mr. Hoover found, that it is a very difficult task, and will need as much sympathy as we should give Mr. Hoover. He had a great many sleepless nights and a great many hard struggles in dealing with that mighty combine.

Mr. CUMMINS. As far as I am concerned, I do not want my question to be construed into any sympathy with the effort to fix prices anywhere upon anything.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I know that very well, from the Senator's position.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if Mr. Hoover's only power was not derived from the food-control act of 1917?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is his only legislative power, but I have already pointed out what power he had as purchasing agent of the various Governments.

Mr. STERLING. Food, feed, and fuel are named as the necessaries in the food-control act over which the power to license is given.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. His legislative powers were limited to those, and the packers had a very large business entirely outside of his jurisdiction, and made a great many profits outside of his jurisdiction.

But, Mr. President, I say Mr. Hoover did his duty when he called these representative people here and made his program, an intelligent program, an effective program, because the result of that program has been to increase the supply of the hogs of the country to such an extent that the receipts have almost swamped the packing houses within the last few months.

Mr. President the packing houses are under obligation to continue to pay the prices which have now been raised to 17½ cents per pound live weight, and because the packing houses are under obligation to continue paying 17½ cents per pound for hogs until March, was not Mr. Taliaferro justified in saying that he believed Mr. Hoover was going to keep his word with the packing houses as long as they kept their word with the country? They are buying hogs at the rate of thirty or forty thousand a day and paying these prices, and I do not know but it is more than that. I noticed that the purchases in Chicago alone the other day were about 30,000. They are paying these prices.

Do you want the country to announce to the packing houses that they need not fulfill their obligations until the end of this hog season? Do you want the price of those hogs broken? I say Mr. Hoover has done the right thing, and he is doing it in Europe now, because he is not only keeping his word to the packers but he is requiring Great Britain to keep her word.

I have in my hand a telegram received by the United Press this morning, dated Paris, and I shall read it for what light it may throw on the subject:

PARIS, January 23.

Herbert Hoover to-day flatly denied the charges made in the United States Senate, during debate on the $100,000,000 food bill, that he had worked in the interest of American packing industry. Hoover ridiculed the idea that he had benefited the big packers.

He declared he worked to give American farmers a square deal and protect small packers.

The attack on Hoover in the Senate was made by enemies of the bill providing $100,000,000 to feed Europeans other than inhabitants of the central powers. Hoover was assailed as the man who would have charge of spending this money.

"I apparently emerge in a new light as the friend of the Chicago packers," said Hoover. "At the same time the mail brings a report from Swift & Co., blaming the Food Administration for reducing their profits by $10,000,000 during the last year. I don't imagine the packers would appreciate a wide circle of such friends.

"I notice also I committed a crime by holding the October joint conference of farmers and representatives of 40 packers, as well as bringing the packers together with representatives of the allied Governments for the purpose of settling on a price for exports of pork that would give the American farmers a square deal, and a distribution of orders that would protect small packers.

"We have even tried to secure the continuance of these war arrangements through the armistice period"—

That is the arrangement with Great Britain and France and Italy for the purchase of these products, and why not? The hogs were raised. The farmers kept their word. Shall the packers not keep their word with the farmers? Shall the nations not keep their word with the packers simply because they have concluded a war sooner than they expected?

Mr. Hoover continues:

"We have even tried to secure the continuance of these war arrangements through the armistice period and the opening of other markets, because the American farmer did his duty and produced the goods.

"If the small farmer and American packer now feel that these arrangements are wrong, it would be the greatest burden off our shoulders if we could know it quickly. The British Government is particularly anxious to be relieved from these arrangements."

Mr. KING. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. How long did Mr. Hoover agree that the farmers should receive from the packers 17½ cents per pound, live weight, for hogs? In other words, did he require the packers to contract to purchase up to a given period?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; until March.

Mr. KING. Next March?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Next March.

Mr. KING. The farmers, then, have gone on the theory that they would find a market, and the packers would be compelled to buy all their hogs for that price, until March of this year?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have; and the price was such that it stimulated the production to such an extent that, as I said, it has almost swamped the packers to take the hogs that came to market.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What was the price fixed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was originally fixed at 15½ cents, then raised to 16 cents, because of the advance in the price of corn; for the last month or two it has been 17½ cents; and on the 28th of this month there will gather in Washington another conference for the purpose of fixing it for the next month.

Mr. President, that is about all I have to say. I have taken the bull squarely by the horns and the hog squarely by the ears. I say Hoover is right. If he told the packers they were under obligation to buy these hogs at this price until March, he is under obligations as the representative of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy to see that they get a fair price for their product. It is just as important for us to keep our word to the packers as it would be to keep our word to the farmers or anybody else; and I say that this attack, therefore, on this bill, this attack on a man who is off in Europe, is a stab in the back which is utterly unworthy. There is not an official of the United States who has rendered greater services than Mr. Hoover has done; and, to my mind, it is an outrageous thing during his absence to make these attacks which do reflect upon his honor and his character, notwithstanding the disclaimer Senators make.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one really good thing deserves to be followed by another. One of the best speeches I ever heard made in the United States Senate I have just listened to by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. One of the best things I ever saw in public print appeared this morning in the Washington Post from the pen of ex-President Taft. It is entitled, "Taft says success of treaty of peace depends on league." I have risen for the purpose of asking permission to insert in the RECORD this letter of Mr. Taft's, published this morning in the Post. I shall not take up the time of the Senate with having it read. I ask unanimous consent to insert it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TAFT SAYS SUCCESS OF TREATY OF PEACE DEPENDS ON LEAGUE—ONLY THROUGH UNION OF GREAT NATIONS CAN WORLD BE SURE OF ENJOYING FRUITS OF ALLIED VICTORY—INTERNATIONAL POLICE TO BECOME IN TIME A MERE POTENTIAL FORCE.

[By William Howard Taft.]

The expressions at the peace conference of President Poincare and Premier Clemenceau in reference to the league of nations, and the published rules of the congress, are reassuring to those who look to the growth of an effective and real league out of the situation. The French leaders see clearly, and say with emphasis, that we have a league of nations now and that it must be maintained in order to achieve the purpose of the war. The circumstances of the struggle forced the allies into an interallied council and then into a common command of the armies under Foch; but for that the war might not have been won. Now the situation after peace will be so complicated and critical that similar unity of action between the five great nations who fought the war will be necessary to enable them and the world to enjoy the fruits of victory and the hardly won prize.

GUARDIANS OF WORLD'S WELFARE.

The rules of the congress recognize that the five great nations—Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States—are the ones which have an interest in all questions coming before the congress as guardian of the welfare of the world, made so by the logic of their winning the war. They are thus established as the initiating nucleus of a world union, as the charter members of a league of nations.

It is to be noted that the league of nations is the first subject to be considered by the congress. This seems to be at variance with the views of James M. Beck and Senators LODGE and KNOX. Mr. Beck argues that as our fathers waited five years after winning independence before making a Constitution the nations ought to be equally deliberate in discussing and framing a constitution for the world. Most people will agree after reading the description by Hamilton and Madison of conditions existing in the interval between our independence and the convention of 1787 that it would have been much better if the convention could have been called earlier. Of course, it may be said that the state of affairs during the interval was necessary to bring the people to see the necessity for a stronger government. But surely Mr. Beck would not wish a recurrence of the quarrels of nations and another war to convince the peoples of the world of the necessity and advantage of world unity to suppress war and maintain peace. It is now just after this horrible war, when its agonies, its sufferings, its losses, its inhuman character, all are fresh in the minds of men that they will be willing to go farther in making the needed and proper concessions involved in a useful, real league of nations. Delay will dull their eagerness to adopt the machinery essential to organized protection against war.

NO SECURITY WITHOUT LEAGUE.

But another fact which Mr. Beck and Mr. KNOX seem to ignore is that a treaty of peace can not be made at Paris by which the peace of Europe can be secured and maintained without a league of nations. These gentlemen may well be challenged to tell us what arrangements they would suggest to the five nations engaged in framing this treaty for peace and making it work, unless it be by a continuing league of those five nations to maintain it.

How can the objects and purposes of the 14 points, especially those directed to rearranging the map of eastern and central Europe and Asia Minor, be achieved and carried to peaceful realization except through a league of nations embracing the five great powers? No one opposed to the league of nations idea has essayed to answer this very practical question. The Paris conference is confronted with it and must answer it. It has answered it suggestively by making the league of nations the first subject of discussion.

Premier Clemenceau said: "The league of nations is here, it is for you to make it live."

Senator LODGE, in his speech, fully recognized the existence of the league of great nations in the war and the necessity for its continuance. Indeed, it is probable that if Senator KNOX and Mr. Beck were cross-examined, their admissions would show them to be not very far removed from the view that something substantially equivalent to a league of great nations must be definitely formed by this Congress with agreed-upon means of enforcing the stipulated peace.

NEGATION NOT VERY HELPFUL.

The Associated Press informs us that a league of nations is in the forming, but that the supersovereignty of an international police force is to be rejected as part of it. This negation is not very helpful. Except in Tennyson's poetic vision and in the plans of impracticables, no such suggestion as supersovereignty has been advanced. The proposed structure of the league, common to the plans proposed officially by the French and English commissions on the subject and by our own official league to enforce peace, embraces a court, a council of conciliation, an administrative branch to carry on international trusts like the government of Constantinople, and an executive council. It further includes an agreement on the part of the great nations to combine forces when an exigency arises either to compel warring nations to submit differences to the court or conciliating council, or to go further and to enforce the judgment and deal with the recommendations of the council of conciliation as may be deemed wise by the executive council of the league.

INTERNATIONAL POLICE FORCE.

Most opponents of the league idea have assumed that the so-called international police is to be a permanent body under an international commander and subject to orders without invoking consent of the nations contributing to the force. This is a great misconception. A potential international police force will be created by an agreement of the great nations to furnish forces when necessary to accomplish a legitimate purpose of the league. In most instances, no actual force will need to be raised. The existence of an agreement and confidence that the nations will comply with it is all that will be needed. Nations who have judgments against them in a court of the nations will generally perform them. It will only be where defiances of such judgments will lead to a dangerous war that the league force need be raised.

Of course, during the interval after the conclusion of peace the possibility of differences and the danger of Bolshevism may require a retention of some of the war army strength of the allies to see the treaty through to its effective execution. But after normal times come again, the strength of the league to secure compliance with the treaty obligations and justice will not be in its serried columns, but in its potential power under the joint agreement.

DIVISION OF WORLD INTO ZONES.

In the convenient division of the world into zones in which the respective great powers shall undertake the responsibility of seeing to it that members of the league conform to the rules laid down by the treaty, it will be unnecessary for any nation to send forces to a distant quarter. The United States can properly take care of the Western Hemisphere and need not maintain in normal times a military establishment more extensive than she ought to maintain for domestic use and the proper maintenance of the Monroe doctrine without such a league. This may be well supplied not by a professional army but by a system of universal training of democratic principles, like that of Switzerland or New Zealand. If this be conscription, its opponents may make the most of it. It will help our boys in discipline of character and in a most useful educational way. It will provide for the prompt display of democratic power to achieve justice. The picture painted by Senator BORAH of the Army of the United States needed for the purposes of the league is the result of a lively imagination, but does not find support in the real need of the league.

After the league of the great powers has been established for the purpose of executing the plans of the new treaty, it will be time enough to take in all other responsible powers. The lesser league will grow naturally into a larger league. Experience will test the practical character of the lesser league and in this wise and in due course the world league will come into being. But meanwhile as a necessary condition precedent to the success of the treaty of peace it must provide for a league of the great nations.

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on the day before yesterday I made an announcement that on Thursday—to-day—I would seek an opportunity to address the Senate on the American Expeditionary Forces. It is quite possible that such an address would assume some length. The bill before the Senate and now under consideration is of such vast importance, however, and the determination of the issue at an early hour is so desirable that I do not intend to-day to interrupt the proceedings. In the event that the bill under consideration is passed to-day, I shall seek an opportunity to address the Senate to-morrow. If the bill is not passed to-day, I shall seek an opportunity to address the Senate on Tuesday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 14516) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 10663) to convey a strip of land on the site of the Federal building at Princeton, Ind., and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of Local Union No. 106, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, of Bay City, Mich., praying for the proposed extension of Federal control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry Italian citizens of Calumet, Mich., praying that the allies' representatives at the peace conference settle the boundary dispute between Italy and Austria-Hungary, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Education of Albion, Mich., praying for the establishment of a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Presque Isle, Me., praying for the establishment of a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SHAFROTH presented petitions of the Trades and Labor Assembly, of the Labor Bulletin, of the Building Trades Council, and of Local Union No. 229, Federation of Postal Employees, all of Denver, in the State of Colorado, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from the Federal Employees' Union of Tucson, Ariz., Cincinnati, Ohio, Albuquerque, N. Mex., Boston, Mass., Charleston, S. C., Montgomery, Ala., Bangor, Me., New Orleans, La., Omaha, Nebr., New Haven, Conn., Atlanta, Ga., Providence, R. I., Dover, N. J., Louisville, Ky., Helena, Mont., Occoquan, Va., Norfolk, Va., Sioux City, Iowa, Des Moines, Iowa, St. Louis, Mo., Kansas City, Mo., Philadelphia, Pa., Pittsburgh, Pa., Wichita, Kans., Fort Leavenworth, Kans., Chicago, Ill., Rock Island, Ill., Detroit, Mich., Port Huron, Mich., Niagara Falls, N. Y., Rochester, N. Y., Brooklyn, N. Y., Milwaukee, Wis., Hayward, Wis., El Paso, Tex., Brownsville, Tex., San Diego, Cal., San Francisco, Cal., Vallejo, Cal., Spokane, Wash., Seattle, Wash., Duluth, Minn., St. Paul, Minn.; of A. C. Weiss, publisher of the Chicago Herald; of sundry Treasury custodian employees of Newark, N. J.; of sundry employees in the Immigration Service, of Chicago; of sundry employees of the customhouse and naval office of Chicago; of sundry employees of the United States Employment Service of Chicago; of the Custom Inspectors' Association of Chicago; of sundry employees of the United States appraisers' stores, of Chicago; of sundry employees of the United States Forest Service, of Missoula, Mont.; of the State Federation of Labor of Kentucky; and of the Trades Assembly of Duluth, Minn., praying for the proposed dollar-a-day increase in salaries of Federal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12210) to amend the act of May 14, 1898, as amended by the act of March 3, 1903, entitled "An act to extend the homestead laws and to regulate the sale and entry of public lands along the shores of navigable waters in Alaska," reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 657) thereon.

Mr. SHAFROTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5989) to grant certain lands to the town of Olathe, Colo., for the protection of its water supply, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 656) thereon.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was recommitted the bill (S. 2496) for the refund of duties paid on materials destroyed by fire, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 658) thereon.

AMERICAN SOLDIERS' CEMETERY IN FRANCE.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask that the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 5313) authorizing the Secretary of War to acquire and maintain a cemetery in France in the name of the United States for the reception and interment of the bodies of American officers and men who lost their lives in connection with the European war, and to appropriate $500,000 therefor, and for other purposes, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The chairmen of both committees are agreeable to this action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

PROHIBITION IN THE CANAL ZONE.

Mr. THOMPSON. On December 15, 1918, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] introduced a bill (S. 5224) to prohibit intoxicating liquors and prostitution within the Canal Zone, and for other purposes, and it was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Philippines. I move that the Committee on the Philippines be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McCUMBER:

A bill (S. 5412) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the municipalities of Bismarck, Devils Lake, Harvey, Carrington, Jamestown, Dickinson, Forman, Minot, Park River, Bowman, Hettinger, Mott, and Bottineau, in the State of North Dakota, captured German cannon, cannon balls or shells, and gun carriages, condemned United States cannon, cannon balls or shells, and gun carriages; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 5413) to increase and equalize the salaries of veterinarians in the Department of Agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 5414) requiring The Adjutant General of the United States Army and the Secretary of the Navy to furnish certain data to the adjutants general of the several States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 5415) requiring The Adjutant General of the United States Army and the Secretary of the Navy to furnish certain data to the adjutants general of the several States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A bill (S. 5416) to establish engineering experiment stations for the purpose of further developing that college in each State and Territory now receiving, or which may hereafter receive, the benefits of the act of Congress approved

July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and for the purpose of developing the natural resources of the United States as a measure of industrial, military, and naval preparedness; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 5417) granting a pension to Nathan L. Brass (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5418) granting a pension to Horton G. Mosher (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota:

A bill (S. 5419) conferring upon tribes of Indians the right to recall their agents or superintendents; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the chief clerk, office of Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, from $2,250 to $2,750, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WOLCOTT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF LIGNITE COALS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I submit a conference report on the so-called lignite-coals bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigations, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2 and 3, and agree to the same.

CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
T. J. WALSH,
MILES POINDEXTER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
M. D. FOSTER,
OTIS WINGO,
E. E. DENISON,
Managers on the part of the House.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 14516. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 7th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 187) providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

REPORT OF GOVERNOR OF PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the annual report of the Governor of the Panama Canal for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1918.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
23 January, 1919.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have had the greatest difficulty in my effort to reach a conclusion with respect to my attitude upon this measure. I recognize that there are many reasons which can be urged in its behalf, and there are many reasons which seem to me to make against the wisdom of the proposed legislation. I do not think the solution of the problem depends upon Mr. Hoover or the meat packers. Neither his conduct nor theirs has determined the vote which I shall feel constrained ultimately to cast.

Before I enter upon what I regard as the material elements of the case I want the Senator from Virginia or some other Senator to clear up, if it be possible to do it, what seems to be a confusion with respect to the facts in the matter. It is asserted upon the one side, with very great confidence, apparently, that the purpose of the bill is to make a market for foodstuffs especially that will enable Mr. Hoover to maintain the prices which have prevailed with regard to commodities of that kind. It is asserted upon the other that the United States has now in Europe foodstuffs and other supplies that can be furnished under the bill aggregating in value $55,000,000, accumulated there for war purposes, and that we have in this country as well as in Europe a large quantity of wheat for which there is no apparent market, and it is intended by those who are to administer the bill that the $100,000,000 thus sought to be appropriated shall be simply turned into the Treasury of the United States in alleged payment of property which already belongs to the United States.

I want to know which of these contradictory statements is true, if anyone here, either the chairman of the committee or any of the Senators who have brought forward the other view of it, is able to clarify the situation.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I am suffering from a bronchial throat trouble and am really incapacitated from taking any considerable part in the debate on this bill. Indeed, my physician warned me that I ought not to leave my apartment to-day, and certainly ought not to engage in debate. I am not going to undertake to do it, but I really want to answer the Senator's question.

I say there has not been one single word found in a cablegram from the American commission or the President or Mr. Hoover which undertook to state that this money was asked in order to maintain the price of any product. On the contrary, it was to relieve the starvation and suffering of our friends in European countries. That is the only reason given for it. It has been stated that in meeting that great moral obligation it would incidentally make a market for American products, but the market for American products was not the inducement. The money was not asked for that purpose. The money was asked for the sole purpose of relieving suffering and starvation among our friends in European countries. Incidentally, it was stated, it would make a market for some of our products. Incidentally, it was stated, it would discourage Bolshevism and disorder in European countries, because we all know that men who are starving are in a condition of lawlessness and disorder. We can not expect orderly government from a starving people.

An allusion was made to the indirect and incidental benefit in the way of restoring peace and order in foreign countries, and, also incidentally, that it would create a market for our products; but the motive, the reason, the cause for asking this appropriation of $100,000,000 is to relieve starvation and suffering in European countries among the friends of the United States and our allies.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just one moment further. The question which I have asked—and possibly I did it rather awkwardly—was, Has the United States these supplies on hand now, accumulated for war purposes, and is the appropriation which it is now proposed to make to be returned to the Treasury of the United States in exchange for those supplies?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as I understand, the tribunal which is known as the supreme council of food supplies—I may not give the name correctly—which has been organized under the council of war of the allied nations in Europe, will have the disposition of this matter. They are to go on the market and buy supplies to relieve this starvation and this suffering. There is no string to it whatever. They are not required to spend the money for supplies in the United States, but they are to spend it. Finding that my throat was in such condition that it was impossible for me to talk without great discomfort, I handed the list of the personnel of this commission to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]; but I will merely say that that personnel includes Lord Reading and some other distinguished statesmen; that it includes the most distinguished statesmen of France. The Italian representatives have not yet arrived. Pending their arrival a very distinguished Italian will represent Italy in this supreme council for relief, and Mr. Hoover and Mr. Davis are representing the United States. That council of eight, representing the four great belligerents, have selected Mr. Hoover as president. They are to determine where and how these supplies shall be bought. The money is not to be expended in the market of any particular country. Incidentally, it will inure to the advantage of the United States, particularly in meat products, because the United States is the only country that has a surplus of meat products. However, the United States also has a large supply of wheat on hand that was acquired under this order fixing the limit of price; but whether this money is invested in that wheat or not will depend on the food council, which, as I have said, is composed of eight of the most distinguished men of this country and of the countries of our allies abroad. They are to determine where this money shall be spent. It is to be spent not to create a market anywhere, not to stop Bolshevism anywhere, but it is to be spent to relieve suffering and starvation among our friends in European countries. In doing that incidentally it will make some market for our products and incidentally it will tend to suppress disorder and Bolshevism.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not interested at this moment in the personnel of the commission which is to manage and distribute the supplies. What I should like to know—and the information does not seem to be accessible—is, Does this bill in fact simply donate property which the United States now has and for which it seems to have no immediate use, or is it intended to be expended in the purchase of food supplies and other supplies which are yet in the hands of private owners?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I thought I made that clear. It is to be used by going on the market and buying these food supplies where the object in view will be best conserved—the relief of suffering and starvation among our friends in Europe. The appropriation is not to be made to take off the hands of the United States Government anything that it has. Whether it will do so or not is to be determined by that commission, which is composed of eight of the most distinguished men in the world. It is not limited to any particular use, but that commission is to determine when, how, and where this money shall be expended, with only this proviso, that the object of spending it is to relieve the starvation and suffering in European countries.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Virginia. I am plagued with the thought that he may exceed his strength, and I hope that he will not continue any effort he is making at the risk of his health. That is a heartfelt wish on my part.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a considerable strain on my throat or I would have been more active in the debate; but I will try not to participate in it any further.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suppose that the Senator from Iowa knows that the Government of the United States, through the wheat corporation, is obligated to take the crop of wheat for 1918; that it has purchased all the surplus which has been offered on the market; that it now owns it, is selling it to European countries, and has already sold a large amount of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Iowa knows that. That was the very point of my inquiry. If we are simply donating to the commission or to the helpless people of eastern Europe a certain quantity of material which we have on hand and for which we have no present use, that is one thing; and if that were the purpose, we ought not to pass an appropriation bill; we ought to pass a bill for the donation of these supplies, naming them, to the commission in Europe for such distribution as they may see fit to bring about. While I do not say that is the chief reason that will constrain me to vote against this bill, it is one of the things about the measure which is very repugnant to me.

It does not seem to me a fair, open, and candid movement upon the part of the Government. The purpose evidently is to take the $100,000,000 which we shall appropriate, if we do appropriate it, and pay it into the Treasury of the United States for material which the country has accumulated in this way. I can easily see that there may be consequences in pursuing a course of that kind that would not be possible if the appropriation were to be used, or is to be used, in the purchase of material still in the hands of private persons or corporations. It is not right for the President or Mr. Hoover or anyone else to come before Congress for an appropriation of $100,000,000 to be expended in that way if the purpose is simply a gift on the part of the United States of the material which we have accumulated in this war or through the obligations of the war and which we now desire to dispose of in some way or other.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to a fact which he already knows, that the bill provides that the money which is advanced shall be returned to the Government of the United States; or, in other words, it is to be used as a revolving fund. I can not see how it will be possible to carry out the theory of the bill if we donate so much pork or so many cases of corn or beans or so many bushels of wheat. I will admit, Mr. President—and I shall frankly say so when I speak upon this bill—that I do not believe that the Government of the United States is going to receive back the hundred million dollars which it donates now as a revolving fund. It will receive back some part of it; but no one can tell what part it will receive. Wherever the money is advanced for the relief of a people who have an organized form of government, that government is to give its obligation for the return of this money; but I believe the bulk of it is going to sources that will never return the money advanced for buying food products for their relief, and I shall never expect it to be returned to the Government of the United States; indeed, if I vote for this measure I shall be greatly surprised if we get 50 per cent of it back.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not viewed it from that aspect at all. I do not expect that we will be repaid for any considerable part of the advance we now make, but I see no difficulty whatever in adjusting the sale of property to these foreign Governments to the idea suggested by the Senator from Utah. Suppose we have an automobile over there—that is one of the things that we are going to try to dispose of—a large number of motor trucks, automobiles, railroad iron, locomotives, and everything else the people in the eastern part of Europe need for their reconstruction. That is the reason the phrase "urgent supplies" is found in the bill; and I am not criticizing that especially, because I think they need all these things probably quite as much as they need food in order to set them on their way in a prosperous direction. But if the United States wants to sell an automobile to the Serbian Government, and the Serbian Government is able now to give it an obligation, it can sell it for what it is worth and take the obligation of that Government for that amount; but if we make an appropriation in money and that is intended simply to reimburse the Government of the United States for the supplies that have been accumulated, then they will go to the Governments which are to be benefited by the act or to the individuals which are to be benefited by the act at the exaggerated prices representing their cost to the United States. I do not want to qualify or surround this act of charity and mercy with any thought that these people must make good to the United States the cost of the war in which we have been engaged. If we are intending to give them the help which is indicated here, we ought to give it so that they will know that, if they return obligations to us, their obligations will represent the real value of the thing given, or, if it is a donation, that they receive the full benefit of the money which we appropriate for that purpose. I fear very much that in this legerdemain of bookkeeping and in the transmutation of this money into materials or supplies or food a large part of the objects which we have in view will be neutralized, and, not only so, but that in future years we will be subject to very great reproach for having resorted to an indirect method of alleviating misery.

Mr. President, I desire to say, in response to the Senator from Nebraska, that I concur with him in his proposition that the United States must keep faith with the packers and with the farmers, and it does not tend to bring my mind to an adverse conclusion to say that before the peace conference assembled in Europe it was understood in America that faith should be kept. I know something about the meetings that were held in Chicago and elsewhere that had for their purpose the stimulation of the production in America of hogs and of wheat. I would have thought this Government faithless, as many of us did think it faithless, if it failed to carry out the arrangement that was made in the fall of 1917 with the farmers in my State. It did not perform that obligation just as it should have performed it; it did not comply with the exact obligation into which it entered at that time; but there was a fair show of performance, and it had its full effect.

I agree that when the Food Administration required the packers to pay $15.50 for 100 pounds of live hog it entered into an implied agreement that the packers, so far as the Government could control, should be permitted to sell their product at a price that would yield a fair profit upon that basis; and when in October, 1918—I think it was October, 1918—a similar meeting occurred in Chicago, and there were representatives of my own State there—some of the most prominent live-stock producers in the country were there from my own State—and it was agreed at that meeting that the farmers should have and the packers should pay $17.50 per hundred pounds for live hogs, the commonest honesty required that the Government that took part in that proceeding should redeem its obligations. That agreement has been continued from time to time, until now it expires on the 1st day of February. It ought to be kept, and whatever is a fair price for packing-house products, upon the basis of live stock at the rates which I have suggested, ought to be maintained if the influence of the Government can maintain such prices.

I do not understand, however, that the criticism of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] or the criticism of my colleague [Mr. KENYON] upon the subject is based upon any suggestion that bad faith should creep into a vital transaction of that kind. If I understood the Senator from Idaho, his criticism is that, even upon the basis of expenditure controlling the price of live stock, the packers made more profit in 1918 than they ever made before in the history of their enterprises, and that they made more profit in 1917 than they had ever made in any year prior to that time. That is the criticism. It is not that the Government should not help sustain fair and honest and reasonable prices which grow out of the promises with regard to live stock; but what justification is there for fixing a price upon packing-house products that would permit Armour & Co. in 1918 to earn a profit of $15,000,000 upon a capitalization which in itself was accumulated by the profits of previous years in the business?

I do not think it is fair to condemn the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] or my colleague [Mr. KENYON] because they think that the prices of these products during these years were too high. I do not know enough about the details of the business even to suggest how much too high they were, but the results in war times were too great; and I think that any man who has the love of country in his heart and who wanted and wants to be helpful in the solution of these great problems which are rushing on us in time of peace must agree that the first duty of the American Congress, as well as the American Executive so far as his power extends, is to devise some policy, is to create some system of regulation, that will prevent consequences and results of the kind I have indicated; and instead of trying to establish sovereignties in Europe, with the attending obligation to maintain and protect those sovereignties, the whole force of the American mind, represented in the Executive and in Congress, should be turned to the solution of these problems which not only confront us but which ought to frighten every thoughtful American citizen.

I say this with regard to the distribution of this largess, because I do not intend to found my objection to the bill or my vote against the bill upon the fact that Mr. Hoover is to distribute it. I do not know whether he is entitled to the glowing eulogy pronounced upon him by the Senator from Nebraska or not. He may be. I, at least, have never found anything in his conduct to indicate that he was not guided by a desire to help the American people, and I can have no doubt that he has the same purpose now. Do not think that this means that I agree with everything he has done, for I think that he or those under him have done as foolish things as ever marred the industrial record of a great country. But that is simply a matter of judgment and does not impugn the good faith or intent of those who were administering our laws.

Mr. President, if we believe that the proposed appropriation ought not to be administered by Mr. Hoover, it can be administered by somebody else. The Senate has it in its power to appoint the persons who shall administer its appropriation, if it desires to do so. I mention that simply to indicate that my objection to the bill does not spring out of the fact that Mr. Hoover or Mr. Davis or anyone else who may be specified are not the proper persons to distribute the fund.

A great deal has been said with regard to the character of the appropriation. What is it? Some have thought it is to be a charity. Even the Senator from Virginia emphasized that phase of the question. I do not think it is a charity. I do not think it has any semblance of a charity. I do not mean to say that its effect, when distributed among these people, would not be charity; but we are not asked to make this appropriation simply because it is a charitable, philanthropic thing to do. We are asked to make this appropriation because it becomes, or it is said to become, a part of the negotiations for peace in Europe. We are asked to make it because it is said to be necessary in order to enable the President of the United States to accomplish the purpose he has in mind.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment; and I say here, lest I omit it a little later, that if I were in sympathy with the thing which the President proposes to do in Europe I would have no hesitation whatever in voting for the appropriation.

I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I merely want to ask the Senator from Iowa if he will not, before he finishes, indicate where it may be found that the proposition is connected in any way with the war?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will. The question, though, is a little misleading. I did not say "connected with the war." I said "connected with the peace."

Mr. KNOX. Well, I meant the same thing. It grows out of the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may as well do it now. I will come to it a little later; but, so that the Senator from Pennsylvania may fully understand what I mean by the words I have used, I observe that the President—and in that respect he is associated with Great Britain and France and Italy—believes that the peace conference should establish—peacefully, I suppose, if possible, but forcibly, if necessary—certain sovereignties in eastern and southern Europe—there are at least 10 of them—and that the United States, together with Great Britain, France, and Italy, should not only establish these sovereignties but should guarantee their maintenance, their protection, their safety; and he intends—and he makes no secret of it; it is as open as any utterance which he ever made, or which the statesmen of Europe ever made—to bind the United States to the maintenance and safety of these sovereignties which are to encircle the old Empire of Germany.

I am not going even to enter upon the question as to whether that may not be the highest duty that falls upon Great Britain, France, and Italy, for they are in Europe; but I question and I challenge the propriety or wisdom of such an undertaking upon the part of the United States. I am not in favor of it; I have no sympathy with it, and I will not vote for an appropriation which is intended to usher in that kind of obligation upon the part of the United States. There is not a Senator here who votes for this appropriation who is not committed then and thenceforth to the plan which the President of the United States has so eloquently and so graphically and so explicitly set forth again and again with regard to the relations which should exist between the United States and these new sovereignties which are to be erected in Europe.

This money, as I understand—and I now come to the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania—this money the President says is needed in order to enable these sovereignties which are to be set up to resist the advances of bolshevism, and thus to be more easily and quickly established. Now, if it is our duty to establish and care for and defend them in the days that are to come, I am willing to accept the judgment of the President with regard to the effect of this appropriation. I am willing to assume that the $100,000,000 which we propose to expend is really necessary to enable this thing to be done. If I want the United States to enter into that relation with Europe, then I should be for the appropriation, and no one ought to question it; but if I am opposed to assuming that attitude toward the affairs of Europe, then I can not in good conscience vote for the appropriation, unless I do it for purely charitable and philanthropic reasons.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, has not the Senator narrowed too much the statement of the President with respect to the rise and spread and operations of bolshevism? As I understand the Senator, he construes the statement of the President to mean that he desires to restrain the operations of bolshevism in the new governments that may be erected out of the central powers. As I understand the statement of the President, he indicates that bolshevism is spreading westward, is poisoning Germany, and that it may prevent the stabilization of Germany, the erection of a government there with which we may negotiate a peace and from which we may exact sufficient and proper guaranties.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want to be at all technical in regard to the matter, because I think the President takes a very broad view of these great problems. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] the other day complained of him because he was an idealist. I do not complain of him because he is an idealist, if he is one. I think he is the most intensely practical statesman of this or any other day. He knows just what he wants, and he usually knows how to get it. He began his administration in the belief that the Executive office had not the power that it ought to have; and from that day until this we have seen one step after another deliberately taken by Congress, until now the President is invested, I think, with all the powers that could be conferred upon any Executive under the Constitution of the United States. I have no doubt that he has intended to use these powers for a good purpose. I have no doubt that he believes that he is a fitter custodian of these powers than any other body of men or any other man. But I think we entirely misunderstand his character when we attribute to him idealism at the expense of practicalism. He has accomplished more in the direction in which he set his face and his mind than any other man, either in this generation or in any former generation; and the only criticism, if it be a criticism, is that he has not marched in the right direction, and he has done things that he ought not to have done, and that is my objection to this bill. I do not intend to clothe him, if I can prevent it, with the power to enter into the agreements in regard to the reestablishment of Europe which he thinks the United States should make. If anyone here doubts my view with regard to his conception of the situation there, I hope he will make it known. I say that it is his view that the Jugo-Slavs, the Roumanians, the Ukrainians, the Polanders, the Czecho-Slovaks, the Lithuanians, the Esthonians, the Letts, and the Finlanders should be erected into independent sovereignties. I have no doubt he hopes that they will become republics, because I doubt not his fidelity to that fundamental principle, and never have, and I hope I never will be called upon to doubt it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. He knows, and all Europe knows, that when these nations are thus grouped, and thus undertake self-government, they can not stand alone. He knows that many of them are not trained and educated and advanced to the point that will enable them to maintain orderly governments within their several borders. No one appreciates that more than he does, I am sure. No one understands it better than Lloyd George or Clemenceau or the statesmen of Italy.

What is then proposed? It is proposed that if dissensions come from within, or if force comes from without, the United States and Great Britain and France and Italy will undertake to guard and protect them against both internal disorders and exterior assaults.

If you want the United States to undertake to do that, then you ought to vote for this appropriation, because that is its purpose. It can be used, I agree, to forward that purpose. But if you do not believe that America should become enmeshed in the intricacies and in the infinite difficulties of European affairs, then you ought not to vote for the appropriation, because its use must be justified upon that ground or it can not be justified at all.

The real truth is that we are apparently passing into a period in which the distinction between nationalism and internationalism is to be disregarded. To vote for an appropriation of this character means simply that you believe it is just as much your duty to guard, protect, develop, and aid the countries of Europe as to guard, protect, aid, and develop your own country. That is the internationalism of which we hear so much. That is it exactly. The President of the United States has said over and over again in substance that there is no discrimination between the duty of this country to our own people and its duty to all the people of the earth; that we are just as much obliged to fight for liberty in Poland as we are obliged to fight for liberty in the United States; and that we are just as much obliged to maintain the Government of Poland as we are to maintain the Government of the United States. He has very distinguished company in that belief.

Suppose we were asked for an appropriation to aid a rebellion in Ireland, why should we not make an appropriation to pay the expenses of a rebellion in Ireland? Do you not believe that Ireland is entitled to her independence on the same theory exactly that Poland is entitled to her independence, or the Czecho-Slovaks or the Jugo-Slavs? Tell me a single reason which indicates that the countries in eastern Europe should have their independence which does not prove conclusively that the people of Ireland should have their independence. What is the difference between contributing money for Ireland to pay the expenses of an Irish rebellion and paying the expenses that are necessary to set up a government in Poland?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am a little afraid the Senator's inquiry will provoke a suggestion and the suggestion may be followed by a bill for an appropriation in the interest of Irish independence.

Mr. CUMMINS. My attitude toward any such bill would be exactly the same as it will be toward this bill. Whatever sympathy I may have with the struggles of the people of Ireland for independence, I would no more think of voting an appropriation to pay the army which was intended to accomplish that independence than I would think of voting for this appropriation which is intended to establish sovereignties in eastern Europe. It rests upon exactly the same foundation.

Why not have an appropriation here for India? For 25 years the people of India have been struggling simply to establish the same relation between India and Great Britain that Canada, New Zealand, and Australia enjoy. Why should we not do something there if we are to take charge of the world and see that justice is done everywhere, to see that self-determination shall prevail everywhere?

Mr. President, it is not a dream, it is a mischievous fancy and a false theory that commits the United States to the guardianship of the world and asks for an appropriation from our people in order to carry out our views of men, eminent men, too, with regard to this subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, while the Senator is discussing self-determination, I wonder what he thinks about San Domingo and Nicaragua?

Mr. CUMMINS. The list is long enough now.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am thinking of our own victims now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it was Emerson who said that consistency is the hobgoblin of small men and mean minds. By that token there are some men now holding eminent positions who would instantly be acquitted of being either small men or having small minds. I do not insist upon consistency. No individual is consistent and no nation is consistent; but I do insist that we shall not ratify in advance the proposal that is being made in Paris by contributing money to the forwarding of a movement of which that proposal is a part.

I do not object to Great Britain and France and Italy guaranteeing the existence and maintaining these new sovereignties. I have the greatest sympathy with their establishment. I hope they will be so successful that all the world finally will enjoy the blessings of free government. All that I am insisting upon is that it is not our business, that it is not safe for the United States, that it is not tolerable for the United States to enter an undertaking of that kind.

We have one guaranty in existence. It pertains to Cuba, and it was wise. Let the successful nations of Europe undertake the guaranty that may be necessary in order to hold these new nations in their places. It will be an evil day when the United States shall find itself bound to send her soldiers or her Navy into the uttermost parts of the earth in order to reduce the inhabitants of some region to order. It will be an evil day for the United States when, forsaking the vital problems of our own country, we devote ourselves primarily and permanently to the problems of other countries.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I rose a few moments ago to suggest to the Senator—but that is not what I have risen to suggest now—that I do not think the President has ever stated, officially or otherwise, that he believes each of the Balkan Provinces, including Lithuania and Esthonia, should be separate and independent nations. I think the President entertains the view that if the Russian people prefer a united republic because of geographic and ethnographic lines they should be permitted to have it, or if some of the territory that formerly was a portion of the Russian Empire should, because of geographic or ethnographic reasons, segregate itself and set up an independent government, and they shall desire that, they ought to be permitted to work out their own salvation.

I think what the Senator said with respect to the President's view concerning Poland and the Government of the Czecho-Slovaks and the Jugo-Slavs is entirely accurate, and is based upon statements which he has made.

But if the Senator will pardon me a moment further, does not the Senator think the record of Germany, the multitudinous utterances of her statesmen, warriors, scholars, preachers, and even members of the socialist and proletariat organizations during the war and up until the armistice, and some declarations since, evince a purpose upon the part of the German people not only to rise to power and imperial greatness again, but when they do rise to sufficient strength and power to engage in some punitive expedition against those who have been her adversaries in this conflict? Keeping that view in mind, if that question should be answered affirmatively, is it not the part of wisdom, and would not the allied representatives be guilty of a lack of statesmanship and wisdom if they should not do it, in a prudent and proper and just and righteous way, to encourage the organization of other nations that would hem in, if I may be permitted that expression, Germany, to prevent her from again engaging in warlike activities for the destruction of nations in Europe, and perhaps the destruction of nations in other lands?

Mr. CUMMINS. With the limitation just put upon the statement of the Senator from Utah, of course he is right; but what are righteous measures, what are just measures, what are equitable things for the United States to do? That leaves the whole question open.

It is my opinion that the establishment of lesser sovereignties around Germany, with the privilege upon the part of Germany to arm herself, instead of being an inducement to peace and the safety of the world from the ambitions of Germany, will be, on the other hand, the easy opportunity for Germany to accomplish her purpose. But I will come in a moment to the German situation. I do not intend to deal with it at length. I will say, though, immediately, that if it is necessary to carry out our purposes against Germany to make this appropriation, then I have no doubt about its wisdom, but from my standpoint the German problem is not difficult and does not involve the expenditure which is here suggested.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. May I direct the Senator's attention again to Ireland for a moment? The Senator has stated that the aspirations of the people of Ireland for independent government are similar to those of Poland. Is there not an essential difference which the Senator apparently overlooked between the situation of Ireland and Poland and these other countries? As a war measure, and for the purpose of bringing the strife to a more speedy termination, we encouraged the subject nations of the central empires to arise and revolt and assert their independence. We encouraged them to revolt against German domination and to set themselves up as independent governments. That was a very proper course in war. These are subject nations of the countries with which we are at war, whom we incited to establish independent governments. Is there not due from us accordingly a somewhat different obligation than that which arises toward the nations which are held subject to our allies?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course the parallel between Ireland and, for instance, Poland is not exact. I only drew them together in order to indicate their substantial similarity, so far as our encouragement is concerned. We were fighting Germany, and these people were hostile to Germany, and they rose and declared their independence. I do not remember any encouragement or promise from the United States that carried itself to the extent of saying that "If you will rebel and establish an independent government, we will undertake to defend you against Germany or against any other country with which you may be at war."

Mr. WALSH. I remember no such promise, either; but the Senator will remember that we did encourage them to rise, and, furthermore, it is obligatory upon us, as a matter of course, to insure, so far as we can, ourselves against a recurrence of the aggression of Germany. Poland is created as a buffer State between Russia and Germany, as a safeguard against the domination of Russia by Germany. Would it not be quite proper, as a part of the peace arrangement, to insure such a condition of things in order to prevent the possible recurrence of the aggression of Germany and her effort to dominate the world?

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, Mr. President, that Poland, from the standpoint just suggested by the Senator from Montana, is not to be an independent nation. It is to be a pawn, a buffer. That emphasizes what I said a few moments ago, that when this appropriation is made it carries with it a pledge upon the part of the United States that we will protect Poland, that we will come to its defense if attacked. I suppose it involves also an obligation to bring order in Poland if there are internal dissensions, because in order to enable Poland to perform the office which the Senator from Montana has just suggested, it must stand, it must not be overthrown; and who is to see that it stands, who is to see that it is not overthrown? Among others, the United States.

I am in favor of a league of nations or an alliance of nations to prevent war. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who so beautifully interprets not only the oracles but the silences of the White House, has on many occasions demonstrated that there ought to be an alliance of nations. I am not in favor of the alliance which was foreshadowed in the many utterances of the President before he went to Europe. I have no doubt he has changed his views in that respect, as all wise men will change their views as circumstances change and conditions are altered. But I am not in favor of any alliance of nations or league of nations which will bind the United States to furnish an army or a navy or put an army or a navy in charge of a supernation or superpower in order to overcome either internal disorders in Poland or defend, for instance, against the assault of the Ukrainians. I am not in favor of an alliance of nations proceeding to that extent, and I understand the President is not now in favor of such an arrangement among the powers of the earth.

Mr. WALSH. Permit me, then, to inquire of the Senator if he is in favor of a league of nations that will prevent the aggression of Germany against Poland and the possible reabsorption of Poland by Germany?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. We have an alliance of nations now that ought to prevent Germany from making war on any power. That brings me to just a word about Germany.

Departing from the brilliant rhetoric which has no meaning whatever with regard to making the world safe for democracy, which is as illusory and as temporary as the morning mist, and coming to the real reasons for our entrance into this war and the object which we had to accomplish through the war or by the war, let me say that I agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] that the aggravating causes for our war with Germany were the continuous inroads and invasions of American rights upon the sea, the brutal, inhuman, murderous conduct of Germany with respect to our rights and the rights of our citizens upon the sea.

I doubt whether we would have entered the war simply to vindicate those rights, although the Senator from Georgia thought we would. I think we entered the war only when there came to the American people the overwhelming belief that if Germany won in her struggle with Great Britain, France, and Italy she would then turn her arms against the United States and become not only a remote but an instant menace to our institutions and to our liberty. It took the American people a long while to reach that conclusion, but they finally did. They finally did see that Germany and her militarism, her ambitions, meant the overthrow of the United States, her institutions, and her civilization. Our object in entering the war was to end that menace. There is just one way in which we can end it. We won the war. There is just one way in which, so far as Germany is concerned, we can forever remove the fear and the apprehension that urged us into this mighty conflict, and that is to disable Germany, disarm her, and keep her disarmed.

I do not know how long it may require to change the character, the hearts, the hopes, the purposes of the German people, but until the character of that people is changed fundamentally they ought not to be permitted to carry arms save to police their internal affairs. That is the way, from my standpoint, in which we ought to deal with Germany. We ought not to leave her capable of attacking any nation.

Mr. WATSON. In order to get the Senator's viewpoint, I should like to ask him whether or not he means by that that we shall keep our own standing army in Germany until Germany changes her character.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not. I assume that Great Britain, France, and Italy should police Germany, so far as it is necessary to police her. But if Germany, after having agreed to disarm herself and after her fortifications are razed to the ground, after her munitions factories are demolished, and after all her military equipment disappears, then begins to re-create her military establishment, I am willing to go to Europe again to destroy Germany's preparations for another war. I have but one thought, and that is that Germany shall for a long series of years be without an army, without a navy, without a munitions factory, without an establishment that turns out guns or that will enable her to become dangerous to the remainder of the world. We can not do that by establishing a circle of sovereignties around Germany and depending upon them to restrain her ambitions.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Senator from Iowa, however, does not desire that this country shall assume any portion of that burden?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am willing to assume that burden if Germany violates her agreements in that respect or violates the terms we impose upon her. I would not keep a single soldier in Europe for that purpose. I would bring them all home after we have done the thing which I have suggested, namely, to dismantle Germany in a military way and destroy whatever materials she may have already on hand that can be turned in that direction. If, then, Germany refuses or fails to perform the terms which we have imposed upon her and begins again the establishment or creation of her military system, and begins again to manufacture guns and to train armies and to construct vessels, and if Great Britain and France can not prevent that infraction of her agreement with us, I am willing to go again and complete the undertaking upon which we formerly entered.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is not the argument which the Senator has just made, namely, that Germany should be prevented again from embarking upon a military career, because if she did it would be a menace to our country, an argument in favor of some sort of agreement or league of nations, by whatever name you want to call it, with the allied Governments with whom we have been associated, by which the guaranties that shall be exacted from Germany shall be carried out, and she shall be prevented in the future from becoming again an enemy to civilization and to the world?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is precisely what I said. I regard that not as a new obligation which we should assume; that is our obligation now without any league of nations, without any further alliance than we have.

What I have said, I think, is in exact harmony with the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I am not saying that the peace conference should not set up these sovereignties; I hope that they will be given free rein, in order that each of these races, with such modifications as may be necessary, may be given independence; I want to see that happen; but it seems to me that the wise course, so far as Germany is concerned, is to say to her, "We lay no obstacle in your way for commercial development." Indeed, we ought to foster that, for if we are to receive reparation, if Germany is to pay for the infinite destruction which she has caused in the world, the German people must earn the money with which to pay it; Germany must earn what becomes necessary to repair Belgium, to restore France, to indemnify Great Britain, and to reimburse the United States—for I think that ought to be one of the terms—but in order to earn that money Germany must be permitted her commercial activities. Otherwise it would be simply a brutum fulmen to say that she shall pay if we do not give her an opportunity to earn the money with which to pay.

However, so far as Germany's military establishment is concerned, I would destroy it. Whatever may be necessary to enforce internal peace—that is, the peace of municipalities and the like—she ought to be permitted to preserve; but in so far as her military establishment, that could or would be used in a world war, or in a war on any other nation, she ought to have none. That ought to be the penalty which shall be imposed upon her for her wickedness and malice in beginning and carrying on this most destructive war of the ages. If Germany at any time is found to be disobeying the terms which we impose upon her in that respect, then it would become the duty, first, of Great Britain and France, because of their proximity, and, next, of the United States, to whip her again, and see that she does not establish that military strength.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. What does the Senator from Iowa propose to do with Germany's navy?

Mr. CUMMINS. I go no further in that problem than to say that it should not belong to Germany. The Senator from Tennessee can do anything he pleases with it if it is not permitted to remain the instrument of German destruction.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree entirely with the Senator from Iowa. I do not want to do anything with it except to keep Germany from using it against civilization.

Mr. CUMMINS. All I insist upon is that Germany shall be left helpless and harmless for the years to come.

Mr. President, believing that these are the principles that should be observed in making peace with Germany, and that these are the principles that ought to be enforced with regard to the new nations that are to be established in eastern and southern Europe, I find no other conclusion possible than to oppose the appropriation which is intended to commit the United States, not only to the establishment but to the guardianship, the protection, and the defense of every country in Europe for all time to come.

Mr. CALDER obtained the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York permit me to interrupt him for just a moment, as I have to attend a meeting of the conference committee on the revenue bill?

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I hold in my hand a telegram from C. H. Canby, who, I am informed, was formerly president of the Board of Trade of Chicago, and is one of the leading grain dealers in that city, a man of high standing and wide experience as to the food situation here and abroad. His telegram reads:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 22, 1919.

HON. BOIES PENROSE,
Washington, D. C.:

Rumors are current that the Food Administration has already expended over $20,000,000 of the expected appropriation without authority of law. This situation should be investigated to determine if there is any truth in the report.

C. H. CANBY.

I do not know whether there is any Senator on the floor at the present time having charge of the pending bill in the absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]——

Mr. McKELLAR rose.

Mr. PENROSE. Has the Senator from Tennessee the bill in charge?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the bill in charge. I am merely representing the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether or not such rumor has been called to his attention or whether he knows anything about the matter?

Mr. McKELLAR. The reading of the telegram by the Senator from Pennsylvania was the first intimation I had of it.

Mr. PENROSE. In view of the fact that this telegram comes from a gentleman of the highest responsibility and a leader in the food situation in Chicago, nationally and internationally, I should be glad if the Senator from Tennessee and the chairman of the committee would take occasion to look into the matter; and I will call their attention to it later on.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it as soon as he returns to the Chamber.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the debate on this bill has assumed a wide range, and I think it is well that it has, for I believe as a result of this discussion Senators have come to understand some facts with which they were unfamiliar.

The people of this country during the war raised for the Red Cross and other organizations engaged in like work sums totaling nearly $1,000,000,000. This money was spent in the camps in this country and Europe for the benefit of our soldiers and our allies, and to a very great extent to relieve the condition of the people living in the countries associated with us in the war. The American people gave freely to these funds, and my information is that when the armistice was signed great quantities of food were stored in the warehouses of Europe under the control of the Red Cross. I assume, of course, that this food is being used to relieve the hunger of the people of the countries really in need.

From the very beginning of the war England, France, and Italy, and the neutral countries of Europe had located in this country commissions authorized to purchase and forward food to them. These commissions in their work here were associated with the United States Food Administrator, Mr. Hoover. We dealt liberally with these people. Everything was done to give them as much food as we could spare, and at the lowest price under the circumstances. England, I am told, as a result of this liberal attitude on the part of the United States, at the close of the war had stored in her warehouses a food supply for her people and her army that would have lasted four months. France, although not as well supplied, had a large surplus on hand. Much of this was brought about through the willingness of the American people during the year 1918 to give up much of the food to which they had been accustomed. I am told also that the record shows the consumption of wheat in the United States in 1918 was over 100,000,000 bushels less than in the previous year and that the quantity of sugar consumed in this country was much less than the previous year, and, further, in the curtailment of every single food product the American people willingly responded.

During all of this period we were building up a great surplus stock. The splendid crops of last year, exceeding by far the crops of 1917, added much to the surplus. In fact, the failure to realize the extent of this increase and the insistence upon curtailment on consumption gave us a surplus out of all proportion to the needs of either our allies or ourselves for the year 1919. Naturally, with the high prices prevailing, production was encouraged in every line, and when the end of the war came we had in the storehouses of America a supply of food far beyond the anticipations of anyone.

We find ourselves now, with the war over and the stoppage of the flow of foodstuffs to Europe, in a condition where, if things were normal and the Government had not taken over the fixing of the prices of food, the people of this country would be able to buy the necessities of life at nearly one-half of what they are to-day.

Europe has stopped buying from us because they can buy cheaper from other places. I am informed that Argentine wheat can be bought to-day for $1.29 per bushel and that there are over 160,000,000 bushels stored in that country. Australian wheat can be bought for $1.14 per bushel, and there are 200,000,000 bushels available, while 80,000,000 additional bushels can be had in India. As against these prices, American wheat at $2.26, primary market, with freight and terminal charges added, bringing it nearer $2.45, will have no market abroad.

Corn in Chicago sells for $1.23 per bushel, while the Argentine corn can be purchased for half that figure. The same holds good for oats, rye, and other products of the farm. The other day I received the astonishing information that in the city of New York alone there were in the neighborhood of 750,000 barrels of flour in the storehouses, and that this enormous supply was so alarming to the flour merchants of the city that they were offering it at a price lower than was agreed upon with the Food Administrator. These figures, of course, are staggering when one comes to consider the price of food to the consumer.

In connection with hogs, it is of interest to note that the 40 principal packing companies joined in sending a letter to the Food Administration last October, in which they expressed the opinion that the proposed basis of stabilizing the price of hogs would result in unduly high prices to the consumer. This letter appears in the Official Bulletin of October 7, and I quote from it as follows:

> This plan may result in the warehouses being filled up with high-priced products. * * * We feel that the establishing of the basis suggested may result in higher prices to the consumer.

The situation now is that hogs are being offered to the packers at less than the guaranteed price of $17.50 per hundredweight. The packers, however, being completely under the domination of the Food Administration, do not dare buy at any lower prices.

Yesterday's Washington Post contained a report of Tuesday's grain market in Chicago. This shows that the rumor that the Food Administration is to maintain the present artificial high price of hogs resulted in an increase of 3 cents a bushel in the price of corn.

The Food Administration formed a corporation under the laws of the State of Delaware, known as the "Sugar Equalization Board." This board bought the entire crop of Cuban cane sugar. The producers there were given to understand that no other purchasers except the board would be able to secure transportation facilities. The board pays the sugar producers 5.50 cents f. o. b. Cuba. This makes the cost of sugar 6.90 cents, duty paid and delivered to the refineries along the Atlantic coast.

Here comes the "nigger in the woodpile." The board, instead of selling to the refineries at this price of 6.90 cents, charges them 7.28 cents a pound for this sugar, thus giving the board a clear profit of 0.38 cent a pound on each pound of raw sugar brought into the country and increasing the price to the consumer by just this amount. If this procedure is continued, the board will make a clear profit this season of about $30,000,000, which, in reality, is a consumption tax on the American public.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Senator is aware of the reason for that difference of 38 cents a hundred, and if he has no objection I will briefly state it at this time.

Mr. CALDER. I have no objection to the Senator doing so.

Mr. SMOOT. Last year, Mr. President, it became quite evident that there would be a shortage of sugar in all the world, and in order to induce the beet growers of the West and the sugar-cane growers of the South to plant additional acreage for the production of sugar, the price of beets was advanced to $10 a ton. Mr. Hoover and the people interested knew that they could not get the tonnage without that increase, particularly after the price of wheat had been fixed as high as it had been.

There was an agreement reached with Cuban producers of sugar that they should be paid $6.50 for their sugar, and the 38 cents difference, I will say to the Senator, between the cost and the freight of Cuban sugar and the amount for which it is sold to the refiner goes to make up the loss on the sales of sugar produced from $10 beets; in other words, it was equalized by the 38-cent profit made upon the Cuban sugar in order that the Food Administration could take care of the loss of about 60 cents a hundred on beet sugar, thus making the price of sugar uniform throughout the United States, whether produced from beets or produced in Cuba. I simply wanted to say to the Senator that that is how that difference comes about.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator from Utah if he has any information as to the disposition to be made of this profit by the board?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hardly think there will be any profit on the whole transaction. The Food Administration purchased all the beet sugar, and the loss on the same is 60 cents a hundred, as I remember now. That applies also to the cane sugar of the South. The 38 cents profit on the Cuban sugar offsets the loss of 60 cents on American-produced sugar in this way: There is more Cuban sugar consumed in the United States than there is sugar produced in this country, and if the Senator will figure out the amount of Cuban sugar consumed and the amount of beet sugar and cane sugar produced and consumed in this country he will find that the profit of 38 cents a hundred on Cuban sugar will just about offset the loss of 60 cents a hundred on the sugar produced in this country.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question while he is on that subject. Can the Senator inform me as to what profits were allowed the beet-sugar manufacturers, and how those profits compared with the profits which they had hitherto been making?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the profits allowed to the sugar producers of the West were very greatly reduced in the year 1918 below what they had been in 1917. In other words, during 1917 the price of the beets purchased by the beet-sugar manufacturers ran all the way from $6.50 up to $8 per ton, and they sold the sugar for higher prices during that year than they sold the sugar for during 1918. The sugar made in 1918 was made from $10 beets, so that really the profits of the beet-sugar companies in 1918 were nothing as compared with their profits in 1917.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, nor is this all. The Sugar Equalization Board have presented contracts to all the sugar refineries, the terms of which specify that the refineries will not purchase any raw sugar except from the board up to December 31, 1919. A very eminent lawyer in New York, Mr. William D. Guthrie, has advised his clients, the Federal Sugar Refining Co., that this contract is clearly illegal and in violation of the antitrust laws. I attach herewith Mr. Guthrie's opinion, which was published in the Journal of Commerce on December 24 last, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SUGAR CONTRACT CALLED ILLEGAL—WILLIAM D. GUTHRIE WARNS AGAINST PROPOSAL—OPINION IS FURNISHED AT THE REQUEST OF FEDERAL SUGAR REFINING CO.—CONTRACT IN QUESTION WOULD GOVERN TRADE FOR 1919.

In the opinion of William D. Guthrie, of Guthrie, Bangs & Van Sinderen, 44 Wall Street, the proposed new contract between the United States Food Administration and the sugar-refining industry would be held invalid by the courts. Mr. Guthrie believes that the creation of the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), a Delaware corporation, as the instrumentality of the Food Administration for the carrying out of the contract is "plainly illegal," and that other features of the proposed contract are of "doubtful legality." The signing of the armistice, it is held, has radically changed the situation.

The opinion of Mr. Guthrie was sought by the Federal Sugar Refining Co. The proposed contract is dated October 24, 1918, and is to remain in force until December 31, 1919. It provides, among other things, that until December 31, 1919, the refiners will not purchase any sugar except from the Delaware corporation, other than such sugars as are provided under the agreement of October 1, 1917, and Hawaiian sugars, and that the Delaware corporation "may earn a profit on any sugar it may purchase and resell to refiners, or any sugar it may purchase from refiners and resell for export."

TEST OF OPINION.

In part, Mr. Guthrie's view reads as follows:

"I am of opinion that the proposed agreement above mentioned, to be entered into by the American refiners and dated October 24, 1918, would be held invalid by the courts on the ground that it was beyond any power vested in the United States Food Administrator or any other officer of the United States Government, and that it would so held illegal on the ground that it constituted a violation of the prohibitions of the acts of Congress commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Clayton Act, approved, respectively, July 2, 1890, and October 15, 1914, as well as of the act of August 10, 1917, itself.

"I am also of the opinion that the proposed agreement would imply and create an obligation on the part of each refiner signatory to buy from the Delaware corporation an amount of raw sugar approximately commensurte with the normal requirements of the refiner's business notwithstanding the provision above quoted from article 6 of the agreement, to the effect that several refiners are 'not in any way limiting their ordinary power or business discretion to determine to what extent they may severally operate their refineries.'"

EFFECT OF ARMISTICE.

"I do not question the patriotic and humanitarian motives which have actuated the Food Administrator and his representatives during the crisis of the war. The conditions existing in October, 1917, may have justified extra-legal methods, to which patriotic refiners were readily willing to accede. But conditions have meantime materially changed. The President—advisedly, as we must assume—declared to the Congress on November 11, 1918, in stating the terms of the armistice, that the war thus comes to an end; for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it would be impossible for the German command to renew it.

"In the light of this official pronouncement by the President, it certainly behooves all Government officers carefully to consult the legal source of their authority and to bear in mind that their powers are limited by the statute, that they can not go beyond its limits, and that no emergency, however grave, can of itself create any source of power. It likewise behooves Government officers now to reflect upon the very questionable propriety of attempting to coerce acquiescence in extra-legal acts by undue pressure or by threats to withdraw licenses or otherwise, however patriotic or benevolent their motives may be.

"I should add that in my opinion section 2 of the act of August 10, 1917, does not empower the President, or the Food Administrator, or any other officer of the Government to organize a corporation under the laws of a State, such as the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), to act "as an agency of the United States for the purpose in part of equalizing the distribution and selling price of sugar.

IMPOSE A CONSUMPTION TAX.

"The creation by the Food Administrator of a State corporation to be availed of as an alleged instrumentality of the Federal Government, the engaging by him in the business of buying and selling sugar (if in fact it be not speculating in sugar), and the disregard of the letter and spirit of sections 4 and 9 of the act of Congress of 1917, are in my opinion plainly illegal, and other features of the proposed agreement are of doubtful frugality. The Delaware corporation may be, and presumably will be, operated for profit, but no such agency of the United States has been authorized by statute with power to risk the funds of the United States or to collect or extort a profit from the people out of the distribution of a food product. Under this plan the Food Administrator could in practical effect impose a consumption tax. This is not a legitimate method of effectuating any power so far delegated to the President or the Food Administrator, and certainly it is not warranted by the act of 1917.

RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

"The agreement in its provisions, its intent, and its purpose would, in my opinion, be held by the courts to be beyond the power of the Food Administration and invalid, and hence not binding upon or enforceable against any of its parties, and least of all binding upon or enforceable against the Food Administrator. No officer of the Government can reasonably or properly be said to act under color of a law which neither gives him nor any other person authority to do the acts in question.

"The proposed agreement, in my opinion, is a combination in restraint of foreign and interstate trade and commerce, and as such clearly violative of the provisions of the several acts of Congress above referred to, namely, the Sherman Antitrust Act, the Clayton Act, and the act of August 10, 1917. This proposition seems to me to be plain and indisputable, and particularly so in view of the provisions of sections 4 and 9 of the last-named act.

WOULD BE NO DEFENSE.

"The Food Administrator, if he entered into the proposed agreement, would be acting not as an officer of the Government but individually as a self-constituted trustee and guardian of the sugar trade, and his official character and patriotic motives would be no defense even to him if indicted or sued for a violation of the several acts of Congress. Nor would it afford any defense to the American refiners to plead that they had entered into such a combination or agreement from patriotic motives at the urgent request and pressure of the Food Administrator or of the President or were coerced thereto by an official threat of having their business ruined by the withdrawal or cancellation of their licenses. Moreover, it should be recalled that any third person injured in his business or property by the operation of the proposed combination could sue any of the parties thereto and recover threefold damages, as prescribed in section 7 of the Sherman Act. That this might constitute a very serious risk can not be doubted."

Mr. CALDER. Nor is this all. During the war there have been tremendous accumulations of raw sugar in Java, which next to Cuba is the largest producer. Authorities in the trade state that this sugar can now be laid down in New York at about 2 cents a pound under the price at which the Sugar Equalization Board is selling to refineries. This Java sugar, however, can not be brought into this country because the Sugar Equalization Board, in protecting its "corner," has the active cooperation of the War Trade Board. The latter made the public announcement on January 14, as follows:

The War Trade Board announces that hereafter licenses for the importation of sugar will be issued only to the Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) or its nominees.

We thus see that the Food Administration, acting through its creature, the Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), has established a "corner" on imported cane sugar; it is levying a tribute of about three-eighths of a cent per pound on every pound of raw sugar; and it is protected in its "corner" by the War Trade Board.

Owing to the importance of tin plate in the manufacture of containers for foodstuffs, the situation in tin is worth noting. Tin is selling in London at about 55 cents a pound. It should be selling here for only a few cents more; as a matter of fact, through the operation of the War Industries Board and of the War Trade Board, tin can not be purchased in this country under 72½ cents per pound. The reason is that the War Industries Board contracted for an enormous supply of tin when prices were at their highest. This tin is now coming into the country and is being offered to the trade at 72½ cents per pound. In order to protect this Government speculation in tin, the War Trade Board will not issue licenses to any private individuals or companies to bring tin into the country, and consumers instead of buying their tin under 60 cents a pound must pay 72½ cents. Here again is an example of the results brought about by clumsy attempts on the part of Government agencies to set aside the laws of supply and demand.

I saw in the newspapers the other day a statement attributed to an officer of the Quartermaster Department appearing before a committee of the House of Representatives, in which he insisted that his department would require a 10 per cent increase in their allowance for food for the Army on the theory that when the Food Administrator ceased to fix the price of food products they would rise at least 10 per cent. This appears to me to be absurd, because with the enormous quantity of food here in this country, and with England and France buying from Argentina and Australia at a price 40 per cent less than we can sell them, there can be but one result, and that is cheaper food for the American people.

My attention has been called, Mr. President, to a statement published in the New York Sun of last Sunday, which shows the extent to which the food supply has been increased in this country compared with a year ago. I quote from that statement as follows:

FIGURES SHOW BIG INCREASE.

Statistics from sources that can not be disputed show that on January 1, 1919, there was an increase of 389,221,075 pounds over January 1, 1918, in storage, of frozen-beef stocks, cured beef, frozen lamb and mutton, frozen pork, dry salt pork, pickled pork, lard, and miscellaneous meats. In the face of these staggering stores many who dispute the wisdom of a continuance of governmental price fixing on hogs with bacon retailing at 60 cents per pound say they can not see any necessity for the present high prices ruling for pork.

The comparative figures of these stocks in pounds tell their own story:

These figures indicate that there were on January 1, 1919, 389,221,000 pounds of frozen beef, lamb, and pork in storage over January 1, 1918. An analysis of these figures will show that the quantity of these food products in refrigerators in this country will amount to the enormous sum of 1,200,000,000 pounds. What shall we do with such a surplus and the demand on the part of the people for cheaper food? The President has fixed the price of wheat at $2.26 for the farmer in 1919, and the Food Administrator has fixed the price of many other products by regulation. In a few days the Food Administrator's department will determine again just what price will be placed on some of these commodities for this year. The people of this country will not be willing to continue to pay 75 cents a pound for butter, 45 cents for ham and bacon, 50 cents for beef, 40 to 50 cents for lamb, and $12 a barrel for flour when they know that the country is filled with enormous supplies of these products.

The other day I read in the newspapers, and it was stated on the floor of the Senate, that we will be asked to appropriate a large sum of money, even as high as $1,000,000,000, to make up the difference this year between the guaranteed price of wheat to the farmer and the normal price in the world's market. Mr. President, there are just two ways to determine this matter, in my opinion, either to repeal that provision of the Food Administration act giving the President the power to fix the price of wheat or else appropriate the necessary amount, so that the country may be able to obtain food at fair prices.

It is obvious that unless the regulations of the Food Administrator and the War Trade Board are entirely abrogated, prices of necessities in this country—and therefore the prices of all commodities—will remain close to their present high levels. Among other effects of this artificial condition is that this country will be the worst market for foreigners to buy in and the best for them to sell in; result, a rapid disappearance of the favorable balance of trade which this country had enjoyed the last few years.

This whole question of high prices of food goes with the prices paid for everything else. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] stated the other day that if we hoped to readjust prices the wage of the workingman must also be readjusted. I concur with him in that statement; but I do insist, Mr. President, that the workingman of the country is not asking any more for what he has to sell than his employer, who is also getting his full share of the profits. The slightest inquiry will develop the fact that while the workingman's pay has been increased materially during the war, it has not been increased out of proportion to the things he is compelled to buy.

If we insist that the price of wheat is to be maintained during the coming year, and with it the price of other food products, then, indeed, it will be difficult for us to insist on the readjustment of the workingman's pay. On the other hand, if we reduce the price of the products raised by the farmer, he has a right to demand that the things he has to purchase be likewise reduced in cost.

Senators have arisen in their places here to denounce combinations of capital and to criticize the business man, and I believe the criticism is just in some cases, for many men have taken advantage of the war emergency to raise prices out of all proportion to the needs of their business. And let me here, today, warn these men that unless there is a disposition here and now on the part of everyone to make some sacrifice in the interest of all concerned, then the whole business fabric will come toppling over our heads. If all are willing to help, then business catastrophe may be averted. If not, who can tell what the future may have in store?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] is absent on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on account of illness in his family. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, never in my service have I been undecided as to what was the best thing for me to do until the pending measure was under consideration by the Appropriations Committee.

I have served in the Senate now for nearly 16 years. I never had a pair during that whole time. I never have dodged a vote in any way. I always have had my mind clearly made up upon every proposition that has been presented to the Senate of the United States during that term of service. My conscience has been perfectly clear in regard to every vote I have ever cast; but I want frankly to admit now that I am not so clear in my mind as to what is the best thing to do, whether to vote for or against this measure. I have been trying to definitely decide from reading the testimony submitted in favor of it and the remarks made. I know this: I would prefer to make a mistake, if I do make a mistake, in upholding the representatives of our Government now seeking terms of peace in Europe than to make a mistake upon the other side.

Mr. President, I can not believe that before Mr. Hoover left the United States for Europe he had a complete understanding of what he was to do when he reached there, or that he had any understanding whatever with the supreme council of supply and relief or with the allied war council as to what should be done by way of relief for the suffering countries of the Old World. I do not believe I reveal any secret when I say that the day before Mr. Hoover sailed for Europe he asked the chairman of the Appropriations Committee to call a meeting of the members of that committee—and I might add that there were a few other Senators present who were not members of the committee—and at that meeting he stated that he intended to leave for Europe the next day, and he felt that it was his duty to tell the members of the committee the object of his mission. He stated that he had been asked by the President of the United States to go to Europe for the purpose of assisting the allied countries in the distribution of the necessities of life to the starving people of Europe. Mr. Hoover did not go into details as to why that should be done, but he said that it was absolutely necessary that it should be done if the lives of millions of people were to be saved.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do we understand that before Mr. Hoover left here, and before he had made any investigation of his own, he had already determined that this must be done?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I know that Mr. Hoover had made an examination before he left here, by representatives of the Food Administration.

Mr. BORAH. I know; but I ask the Senator now whether I am to understand that before Mr. Hoover arrived in Europe he told the committee that he was determined upon this program of feeding Europe?

Mr. SMOOT. I would not go so far as to say "feeding Europe." I will say that Mr. Hoover stated to the committee that he had men in every country of Europe, and that he had reports from those men showing the necessity of early assistance to the starving people of those countries.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask if he stated when he had sent those men to Europe, and under what authority?

Mr. SMOOT. He did not tell the committee when he sent them, but I do know that he has had them there for some time. There is no doubt at all about it and no secret about it.

Mr. BORAH. Under what authority did Mr. Hoover send men to Europe, prior to the signing of the armistice, to investigate the conditions?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should suppose that he acted upon the power that was granted to him by Congress in the food act. I do not think that that act limits his power to controlling the food situation in this country alone; and not only that, but I wish to say to the Senate that the food that has been shipped to the different countries of Europe has been purchased by Mr. Hoover. The allied countries have given him the power to purchase the wheat, to purchase the foodstuffs of all kinds for England, France, Italy, and other countries as well.

Mr. BORAH. I know that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. And I suppose it is through that power that he has exercised the right of sending men into Europe for investigating the food conditions.

Mr. Hoover stated to the committee that he had no idea how much money would be required, if any at all; but he did suggest that more than likely he would require a revolving fund of twenty-five or thirty million dollars, and I think the chairman of the committee—and if I am wrong I want him to correct me—said to Mr. Hoover, "If it becomes absolutely necessary for you to have the money you no doubt will cable or write to the chairman of this committee."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator is absolutely correct about that.

Mr. SMOOT. At that time there was no understanding as to how much money it would take. He had not met the allied council of supply and relief. No conferences had been held between him and representatives of the other countries. After he arrived there those meetings were held and counsel taken, and it was decided then by this supreme council of supply and relief that it would take a minimum of $300,000,000 to relieve the sufferings of the peoples that were in dire distress.

Mr. President, as to whether or not $300,000,000 will be sufficient, I do not know, and I do not believe Mr. Hoover knows; but the supreme council has come to the conclusion that it will take at least that amount, and of that amount the President of the United States and Mr. Hoover agree that America should furnish $100,000,000, England and France and Italy to furnish the other $200,000,000, making a revolving fund of $300,000,000. The bill specifically states that it shall be a revolving fund, and I want to state frankly that the evidence that was submitted to the committee went to show that the greater part of the money advanced would be returned, and that it was only a charity in so far as it advanced money to the people who were starving, and charitable in the sense that it saved them from a pending danger, and that they were to pay the amount advanced back to those advancing the money.

Mr. President, I have no doubt but that some of this money is going to be returned to the Treasury of the United States. In fact, I am positive of it. I believe that every dollar of it that is furnished to the people of the northern part of France and Belgium will be returned. I believe that all of it will be repaid that is advanced to people where there is a semblance of government or a government that has been recognized by the allied powers and the United States. I know, however, that millions of dollars of this appropriation will go to people that are living to-day under no form of government recognized by the allied powers or by our Government, and I doubt whether a cent of such advance will ever be returned to the Treasury of the United States. When this bill passes, if it does pass and become a law, and the money is expended for that purpose, I know that it will be impossible for all of it to be returned. As I stated this morning, if we receive back 50 per cent of it, that is all that I shall expect, and more, too. If I vote for the bill, it will be with the distinct understanding that as to the major portion of this appropriation it is in fact a charity.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator spoke of northern France. Does the Senator think that France is now in need of financial relief from the United States to feed its own people?

Mr. SMOOT. I think there are a great many people in northern France that have to be fed; and I was going to say to the Senator that under the arrangement that is made it could hardly be called a case of the United States feeding France, because a part of the $300,000,000 comes from the revenues of France.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] objects seriously to the distribution of this appropriation in the way provided, as far as the United States is concerned, and thought that it ought to be distributed as a direct gift of the specific items of food that we intend to furnish and not in the form of the fund provided for.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator spoke just a moment ago about getting back that portion of this fund that will be expended to feed people in northern France. The showing here is that France is contributing money to feed the rest of Europe. France has suffered more than any of the allies in this war, because she has borne the brunt of the war; but France is great in the organization and reorganization of peace, as she was great in war, and is fully able to take care of her own people, and is taking care of them, and taking care of the people in other parts of Europe. She is not asking for charity from the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so far as northern France is concerned, I do not consider that it is charity, and have so stated; but as to the great part of France that was overrun by the hordes of the Hun, whose cities were destroyed by the hundred, where there is not one stone left standing upon another and every vestige of life is completely destroyed, when those people go to their homes you can not tell me that they are not in dire distress and that they do not need assistance from every source possible.

Mr. President, the only way this can be done properly is to have it done in the way that this bill provides or that the program as mapped out provides, and that is that the money given by each one of the allied countries shall be put into one fund, and wherever goods are purchased, no matter from what part of the world they are purchased, they are to be paid for out of this fund, and when part of the money is returned it is to go into the fund, and when the final conclusion of this undertaking is reached whatever is collected from those that have been assisted will be distributed and paid back in exactly the same proportion that it was paid into the fund.

This is the only logical way that it could be done. It can not be done by England buying a cargo of wheat or of flour and distributing it to the needy somewhere and America sending over her meat products or a cargo of wheat and having that distributed somewhere, and then future payments made for those items thus distributed returned to the country furnishing each article. I say that the only way to do it is to do it in the way that is provided for in the pending bill if we are going to do it at all.

This proposition comes unexpectedly to the American people. The war having virtually ceased, or at least an armistice having been signed, and everyone in all the world believing that the war was at an end, the American people believed that with all the charity that they had extended in the past the calls for foreign assistance made upon them were at an end; but, Mr. President, from those who are upon the ground, those who ought to know, there comes this demand for additional assistance—I may say, in the last hour of the great conflict. When we contemplate the wonderful response that the American people have made to every call on them; when we know and realize the hundreds of millions and billions of dollars that the people have given gladly to carry on this great world conflict and bring it to a successful conclusion; when we know that every State in the Union has not only answered the call of the Government upon every occasion but more than done so; and when now perhaps the last call is made, and the call is for the purpose of saving the starving people of Europe, not brought about by any act of theirs, I want to say to the Senators that if there had been appeals made to the American people that a gift be made for this amount, or a direct donation, I have not a doubt but what it would have been granted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Not for the purpose of controverting any statements made by the Senator from Utah, but simply for information, I wish to ask him as to this fund for which he speaks. If I understood him correctly, France is to contribute a third, England a third, and the United States the other third. I wish to understand if it is to be used for the purchase of food to be distributed in France or England?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think any of it is to be distributed in England. I think some of it is going to be distributed in northern France. As I have already stated, most of it will go to Belgians, Poles, Ukrainians, and Serbians—people who have virtually lost everything they had on earth and have not a thing to live on.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, that would be outside of France. If the people of France can contribute $100,000,000 to this fund, what is the necessity for us to contribute? I am not saying now that I am opposed to it, but I ask simply for information. If the people of France are able to contribute $100,000,000, or one-third of the fund, what is the necessity for the United States to contribute, if it is for their use only? Is there any reason to suppose that the fund is to be distributed exclusively outside of the countries which have been named?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say, as I said before, the program was mapped out by the supreme council of supply and relief and supported by the allied war council, and that program is to take care of the suffering people wherever they may be.

Mr. GRONNA. Of Europe?

Mr. SMOOT. Of Europe. I mentioned the northern part of France, because I have no doubt but what they will require relief, and as long as relief is the program, why say to France that she shall take care of her own sufferers separately from the program of taking care of the peoples of Europe who are suffering?

Mr. GRONNA. I am finding no fault with that. The Senator is a member of the committee having this bill in charge, and it is reasonable to suppose that he can give the Senate some information as to the desire of the commission as to where the food shall go. I should like to know if it was understood by the committee that this mission has asked for this fund that it might be used for the purpose of purchasing food not only for friendly nations, those who have been our friends in this struggle, but also to be used and distributed in those countries that have been our enemies in the war?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that could not be done under the provisions of the bill. The bill specifically states that it shall not be used for feeding the people of countries that were the enemies of the United States.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator evidently did not understand my question. I simply wanted to know what the committee understands. I have read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the committee understands.

Mr. GRONNA. That it shall be used just for people of the allied nations or of the friendly nations?

Mr. SMOOT. For people of the friendly nations of the world.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me in his time, I will say to him that we had before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry during this week a gentleman who stated under oath that he sat in all the conferences with this commission, as you may call it, and he named the men, and that Mr. Hoover, Mr. Hurley, the representative of Great Britain, Lord Reading, the representative of France, M. Clementel, agreed that it should be used not only for the allied nations or the friendly nations but for the enemy nations. That is why I asked the Senator the question I did.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that under the provisions of the bill it could not be used for that purpose. I wish to say to the Senator that the man who testified that way may have gotten mixed as to whether it was this fund or whether it was Mr. Hurley's proposition of selling to Germany and Austria some $70,000,000 worth of food products in return for certain shipping and products that they have for disposal.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator permit me to answer that?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not say that that is the case; I simply say it may have been.

Mr. GRONNA. I think in justice to the man whom I have quoted, I should also state that he said it was understood by this commission that the entire fund should be used for the purchase of food sold for cash.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course that could not possibly be true. I will say to the Senator that I know Mr. Hoover did not think so when he left, because if the Senator was here when I made the statement of Mr. Hoover's appearance before the Committee on Appropriations he will remember that Mr. Hoover then did not make any such proposition. That was before he went to Europe.

Mr. GRONNA. This witness stated that that was the understanding not only of Mr. Hoover but of this commission.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if it was the understanding at any time it was not the understanding the day before Mr. Hoover went to Europe.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me not be misunderstood. This witness has seen Mr. Hoover later than the committee has seen him. This was after the Senator from Utah and the committee had seen Mr. Hoover.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course I can not say from personal knowledge what happened in Europe, other than what appears in the cablegrams; but I say I know that no part of the $100,000,000 can be used for the relief of the enemy countries of the United States under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. President, I know the time has got to come, and that soon, when Congress must cease appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars. I thought it had arrived before this bill came before the Committee on Appropriations; but, Mr. President, this appropriation of $100,000,000 is asked for at a time when the representatives of our country are undertaking to reach a peace agreement; they say it is absolutely necessary that this shall be done; and I, as an American citizen, feel that I dare not take the responsibility of saying that it shall not be done.

I know that in the years to come taxes will be burdensome upon the American people. That time will be here not only this year, next year, and the next, but I say that my grandchildren will be paying heavy taxes on the obligations incurred by the Government of the United States for participation in the present world war. Rather would I begin with every appropriation bill that comes to the Senate at this session and eliminate from it every dollar that is not absolutely necessary than to make a mistake in defeating this bill. Mr. President, if mistakes are made in an annual appropriation bill they can be rectified within a few months. Such mistakes can not involve the future peace of our Government, but the pending appropriation may have such an effect. If this appropriation is to be made at all, it ought to be made at once. If the money is to be used at all, it ought to be used now. People can not go month in and month out with nothing to eat. If we are going to save the lives of suffering hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of people, the quicker we do it the better.

I do not know whether it is worth while, Mr. President, to call attention to other matters that have been referred to during this discussion, because it seemed to me they were foreign to the subject. I have no doubt it would be just at this time to say the criticisms of the packers in some respects are unjust. I have no defense to make for them whenever they do aught that is contrary to the rules of honesty and justice, but I say now in justice to them that if they had not been organized as they were at the outbreak of war our American boys would never have been fed as they have been. In justification also of Mr. Hoover, he made his contracts not only with the producers of pork, in which the packers were compelled to pay 17½ cents per pound live weight, but he compelled the packers to buy the same and then limited the profits which they could make upon any sale to an amount not to exceed 2½ per cent. I claim now there is not another class of business in all the world whose sales charges are as low as 2½ per cent. If we want to save the consumers of this country money and bring down the cost of living, let us go to the places where they are not charging 2½ per cent, but in many cases 100 or 125 per cent on many sales. I say there is not a retail store in the District of Columbia which sells at a profit of less than 20 per cent on sales, and it runs all the way from 20 per cent up.

I know it sounds big to say that Armour & Co. made $15,000,000 last year, but do you know why they made it? Their sales were over $861,000,000, and they made less than 2 per cent upon all their sales. They made less than $1 per head on cattle that passed through their plant.

But of course, Mr. President, the amount of business they did was something marvelous and unheard of in all the history of the world. Notwithstanding the great increase in business their overhead expenses were the same, their advertising was the same, and the percentage on sale expenses were greatly reduced. Their ordinary sales of about $250,000,000 increased for 1918 to $861,000,000. Swift & Co. sold over 4,500,000 pounds of beef during 1918. The figures are so startling and so stupendous that we can hardly comprehend them, and we never could have believed them possible unless we had had this world war.

I wish to say now that I can not conceive how it is possible for any man to criticize another for limiting the profits on sales to not more than 2½ per cent. I can not recall, Mr. President, of very many businesses in all the world where organization is so complete that a profit of 2½ per cent on sales will yield an excessive profit on the capital and surplus invested.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator know what per cent the packers made upon their capital and surplus for the year 1918?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say in this connection—and I am glad the Senator asked the question—that capital and surplus was not the only money used by Armour & Co. during the year 1918. They had over $250,000,000 of borrowed money——

Mr. BORAH. I am asking the Senator a question now: What was the per cent which they made upon their capital and surplus for 1917 and 1918? I do not care anything about this 2½ per cent turnover. If men can turn it over in a monopolistic field, that does not mean anything at all. How much did they make at the end of their year upon the capital and surplus?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not yet received the statement and I can not say what the profits are, but I do say that the contract which was made between the packers and Mr. Hoover was that they should not make more than 9 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. That was on one line of their industry. On all the rest of it they were left absolutely free and untrammeled, and made as high as 47 per cent upon some of their other industries.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, not only their meat products and food products but all the other products produced by them sold for $861,000,000 for the year 1918, and they made less than 2 per cent upon the whole of it, by-products and all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not basing my opposition to this bill upon the profits of the packers, but I do not like to see a false economic principle receive the support of the Senator. I am sure the Senator from Utah will not differ from me with regard to the real principles.

Armour & Co. have $100,000,000 capital stock. They have that because they increased it fivefold, I think in 1915 or 1916, out of the surplus which had been laid aside in the previous years, which represented, of course, their profits. The true way of determining whether Armour & Co. sold their stock at too high a price is to ascertain the return which the business afforded upon the capital invested in the business. If they made $15,000,000 in 1918, that represents a return of 15 per cent upon the $100,000,000 capital. It is true that Armour & Co., and I suppose it is true of other packers, borrowed a large amount of money during the course of that year, but the interest which they paid upon the money which they borrowed is reckoned as a part of the expenses of the business.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is all deducted before we arrive at the profits upon the capital actually invested by those who own the business.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. Therefore the question is whether 15 per cent on the capital invested is more than a business should return to capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is not one of the Senators here who does not know that if it had not been for the wonderful demand created by the war the sales of Armour & Co. would not have been $861,000,000. In proportion to the amount of their sales less than that their gains would have been less.

I know concerns in this country that have in two years during the war not only cleared every dollar of the cost of putting up their plants, every dollar which was invested in any way for operating the plant, but have made hundreds of per cent in addition. I do not believe that was right. I do not believe, Mr. President, that Mr. Hoover did wrong in controlling the packers. If they had not been controlled, with the demand for foodstuffs all over the world, no one can tell where the prices would have gone. If the sugar producers of this country had not been controlled, I believe that sugar would have advanced in this country to 20 cents a pound, the same as many of the foreign countries have been and are paying to-day. The best thing that was ever done for the American people was the control of the production of sugar in this country and the control of the Cuban sugar. I say now that Mr. Hoover could not have controlled the sugar that is produced in Cuba unless he had the power granted him by our allies to buy the whole of the crop, and that they would not have purchased a pound of it.

Has the producer of sugar in Cuba suffered? No. Last year he was paid $6.50 per hundred pounds for his sugar, 100 per cent more than he received before the war. They made millions of money, and it was a mighty good thing that the price was controlled, because there was a scramble for sugar all over the world, and no telling where the price would have gone if it had not been controlled.

Mr. President, there has been a good deal said here in this connection with reference to the reconstruction of our industries in this country, now that the war is over. Would to God that it had been undertaken more than a year ago in this country. Mr. President, on the 11th day of April, 1918, over 10 months ago, I delivered an address before the Industrial Club of Chicago, and among other things I referred to this very matter of the reconstruction of our industries after the close of the war. I do not know whether I could better express it now than I did upon that occasion. The part I shall take the time to read is very short. It is as follows:

"Practical wisdom is only to be learned in the school of experience. The hard facts of existence give that touch of truth to character which can never be imparted by reading or tuition, but only from contact with mankind.

"Fine sense and exalted sense are not half as useful as common sense. There are a host of men of wit to one man of sense. That has been the case in all the ages of the world, and no doubt will continue so until the end.

"When war was declared by the United States against the Imperial German Government we found ourselves totally unprepared, and I am fearful that unless some action is soon taken by our Government we will find ourselves unprepared to meet conditions that will arise in the world's commerce when peace is declared.

"Our leading allies and our enemies as well have already established industrial departments to deal with commercial and economical problems which will arise after the close of the war.

"No such action has been taken to enable our industrial institutions to meet the competition following the close of the war, which will be the most severe of any age of the world.

"I read not long ago an account in a foreign paper of arrangements already made by England, France, and Germany to capture as great a proportion of the commerce of the world as lies in their power.

"I pause here long enough to say that there is a feeling—shall I say of resentment on the part of a few who actually believe that to-day England is thinking more of her future control of commerce than she is of winning the war?

"I know that there is no straw left unturned by England to not only retain her world-wide commerce, but to enlarge it, and we have but to look at the statistics of other countries and we will see her foreign trade has not diminished but increased since the war began.

"We must not forget that when this war closes the industries of all the countries will be highly efficient compared with what they were before the war. There are a thousand problems that will be involved never dreamed of before the war, and we must squarely meet them, or our trade with foreign countries will be lost—what little we had.

"We will find that within a month after the close of the war England and Germany and other countries will have their merchant marines plowing the seas and hastening to carry raw material to their manufacturing plants, at present making munitions of war, but restored to their original purposes.

"Is there any doubt that following this war the question of employing the millions of soldiers released will be one that will demand the greatest wisdom on the part of public and business men, as well as the laboring men themselves?

"In England, for instance, a ministry of reconstruction has been created, and through that agency the minutest details are being perfected for reconstructing their whole economic and social structure.

"Among the subjects the ministry is considering are finance, raw materials, military stores, labor employment, agriculture, education, foreign trade, and public administration.

"Our allies believe that in time of war they should prepare for peace.

"Congress should not adjourn the present session without specific action along these lines. I am not alarmed about internal troubles occurring during the war period, but I am fearful of what is going to happen after the war and before normal conditions are restored.

"I am worried as to what is going to happen when wages must be readjusted in order to meet foreign competition; when we must arrange to maintain our own home markets; when hundreds of thousands of laboring men will be seeking employment; when the American people will fully realize that extraordinary war taxes will continue to be imposed and collected for years after the war is closed."

Mr. President, I do not go further; but I could proceed for hours and tell the people of the United States what a chance we have missed in the last 12 months in not preparing for the reconstruction of our industries with a view to the employment of our laboring men at the close of the war.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In connection with what the Senator is just saying, it may not be out of place to call attention to the fact that on January 4, 1918, I introduced a resolution in the Senate to provide for a commission to look into the problems of peace. That commission was to have on it representatives of all the leading industries of the country, and it was to do just exactly what the Senator has pointed out the importance of doing. I introduced that resolution, but we could get no action from any of the committees controlled by the majority.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember well the resolution offered by the Senator. Not only that, but I remember well the resolution that was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. But no notice was taken of them. We have been drifting along, Mr. President, with no preparation whatever, and the war coming to an end so suddenly, throwing millions of men back into industrial pursuits, has already brought to the attention of the American people the lack of former action that was so necessary along this line.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The case is most admirably stated in the extract which the Senator from Utah has read from his speech in Chicago. It is a graphic description of the situation and of our duty. What I should like to know, however, is this: It will require a very large expenditure of the public money—temporarily, at least—to bring about the preparation for peace in our own country. How does the Senator from Utah expect to aid the accomplishment of that purpose by spending a hundred million dollars for reconstruction in Europe?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no proposition here for spending $100,000,000 for reconstruction in Europe. There is a proposition for spending $100,000,000 of American money, together with $200,000,000 of the money of the countries associated with us in this war, for the purpose of preserving life.

I want to say now to the Senator from Iowa that I would not vote to appropriate one single solitary cent of American money if I thought it was going into the development of the commerce of foreign countries. I do not believe a dollar of it will be spent for that purpose. If it is so spent, I will say to the Senator that it will be spent without any authority of law, without the approval of the American people, and it ought to be condemned, and will be condemned by all.

I have voted for many measures in the last two years which in ordinary times I should not have voted for under any circumstance; legislation has been passed here within the last two years which I believe was revoluntionary and socialistic in the most rampant form; and I hope and pray that its enactment will not have the effect of encouraging the people in ordinary peace times to demand such legislation for the future.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. It occurred to me while the Senator from Utah was reading from his very admirable address delivered in Chicago that we ought not to lose sight of the fact that up to about November 11 we were pretty busily engaged preparing for war and turning out war materials. I do not see that we had much leeway to do very much toward preparing for peace up to that time. I think the Senator will admit that the war ended pretty nearly a year before most of us expected it would end. At any rate, there was not very much we could do except to counsel looking ahead, and that sort of thing, beyond what we were doing to turn out munitions and other means of winning the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, how mistaken the Senator is! When England and France were in a death struggle, drawing every man possible from their industries, three years ago they found men at home with sufficient knowledge and wisdom to consider reconstruction of industries after the war most thoroughly. Did England stop and did France stop the formation of a plan for reconstruction in the darkest days of last April, when it looked to all the world as though the very next day Germany would break through their lines and take Paris? I believe, Mr. President, as much as I believe anything, that if it had not been for an overruling power the Germans would have captured Paris. Last April when Germany was pressing the French Army back each day, and the supreme effort finally made a break in the line, I am told that a dense fog, so thick that a man could hardly see his hand before him, settled over the two great contending armies, and it was for that reason that the Germans did not know that the French line was broken for the width of 8 miles and the road to Paris was open to the German Army. However, it was not to be so; God ruled it otherwise.

I say now that the lack of providing for a reconstruction program is one of the things which will result to the disadvantage of our country more than anything that has happened in this war.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Utah calls attention to the fact that France and England more than three years ago anticipated the necessity for preparing for peace conditions. Is he aware of the fact that President Wilson two years ago anticipated this situation and prepared to meet it? Let me call his attention to President Wilson's declaration with regard to this matter. I find in the published volume of his addresses and papers, on page 315, that President Wilson said:

> Besides contributing our ungrudging moral and practical support to the establishment of peace throughout the world, we must actively and intelligently prepare ourselves to do our full service in the trade and industry which are to sustain and develop the life of the nations in the days to come.

I hope the Senator from Utah will mark the succeeding language:

> We have already been provident in this great matter and supplied ourselves with the instrumentalities of prompt adjustment. We have created in the Federal Trade Commission a means of inquiry and of accommodation in the field of commerce which ought both to coordinate the enterprises of our traders and manufacturers and to remove the barriers of misunderstanding and of a too technical interpretation of the law.

Again:

> In the new Tariff Commission we have added another instrumentality of observation and adjustment which promises to be immediately serviceable. The Trade Commission substitutes counsel and accommodation for the harsher processes of legal restraint, and the Tariff Commission ought to substitute facts for prejudices and theories. Our exporters have for some time had the advantage of working in the new light thrown upon foreign markets and opportunities of trade by the intelligent inquiries and activities of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which the Democratic Congress so wisely created in 1912. The Tariff Commission completes the machinery by which we shall be enabled to open up our legislative policy to the facts as they develop.

I call this to the Senator's attention in order that he may not be unnecessarily concerned about our future.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all I have to say as to that is, may Providence have mercy upon the industries of this country if they are compelled to rely upon what the commissions named in that address will do for them.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand that there are only three active members now on the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all.

Mr. McLEAN. But they have some thousand employees, who, I understand, are receiving a living wage out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate any further. I simply felt like saying what I have said upon this occasion more in explanation of my position than for any real benefit or assistance it might afford in the passage of the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish the Senator from Virginia would not do that. If Senators do not wish to hear me, I do not desire their attendance.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think Senators ought to be present, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Myers	Smoot
Bankhead	Henderson	New	Spencer
Borah	Hitchcock	Nugent	Swanson
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Thomas
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thompson
Colt	Kellogg	Poindexter	Townsend
Culberson	Kirby	Pollock	Trammell
Cummins	Knox	Pomerene	Underwood
Curtis	La Follette	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
France	McLean	Shafroth	Weeks
Gay	McNary	Sheppard	Williams
Gerry	Martin, Ky.	Sherman	Wolcott
Gore	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Hale	Moses	Smith, Mich.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] on official business of the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is unavoidably absent from the Senate to-day. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, in discussing this measure I promise brevity. I should not address myself to the subject at all but for the surpassing importance of the bill and because I believe it involves the honor of this Nation.

The discussion has assumed a wide range. Much of it has been interesting, but I believe has no direct bearing upon the great question at issue. We have heard discussed the shipping program, price fixing, the Food Administration, and general economic questions bearing upon the prosperity of this country. In my opinion this bill should be considered within much narrower limits.

I do not need to confess that, with other Senators, I have great reluctance in bringing my mind to support this bill. I had hoped, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has said, that the war was practically ended and that we could stop making these appalling appropriations which are being imposed upon the taxpayers of this country, and I shall join the Senators in doing everything I can to relieve that condition; but, Mr. President, I am not prepared to say that, when the cry of distress comes from a stricken world, we should turn a deaf ear to it.

What are the conditions? For four years a war has ravaged Europe, involving more countries and having greater effect upon the civilization of the world than any conflict since the fall of Rome or the French Revolution—appalling in its losses, in its waste, in its crimes, and in the trail of want, misery, and starvation which has followed it.

Now, what do we find to be the conditions in Europe? Take Serbia, for instance. As the armies of the central empires swept through the peaceful agricultural valleys of that land they devastated homes, drove off the cattle, destroyed the farm machinery, the food, the very seed, and left the country a desert. The Serbian people were driven into a little corner at Monastir, where was evidenced the greatest heroism of any little nation oppressed and beset by all the mighty power of the central empires.

Look at Poland. We have thousands and hundreds of thousands of industrious Polish citizens in this country. They are good citizens. We have thousands of them in my State. For generations and generations, aye, even for centuries, the hope of an independent Poland has inspired that people; but over her land swept back and forth the contending armies of Russia and Germany until it became a waste. I shall not go into the details of the condition of these friendly people who have sacrificed everything they had for the same cause you and I were supporting. We have recognized them; we have stated that we desire them to establish a government; we have recognized the Slavs of central Europe, and to-day they are starving.

I realize that my first duty is to the American soldiers who went upon the blood-stained fields of France to defend this Nation and to fight for our cause; I have not been remiss in my duty to them, and I shall not be. I realize that my first duty is to the toiling masses of my own country, and everything I can do to insure to them cheaper food, better living conditions, and good wages I shall do.

We have for several years been aiding in feeding stricken Belgium. I need not repeat the story of that people; but if it had not been for little Belgium, which stood at the gates and prevented the onslaught of the Hun, as Charles Martel met the invading hosts centuries ago, I do not know what the history of civilization would have been.

I am confident that the feeling in this country is such that if there were opportunity, if there were time to collect $100,000,000 by private subscription in order to meet the demands of Europe at this time, the American people would gladly give that sum; but, as has been said, relief must come to these people now, if it comes at all, and we are wasting precious moments even while we are debating the question, although I think it should be discussed fully on all sides. I am very glad to hear the opinions of Senators who do not agree with me, for I wish all the light I can procure upon the subject. But, Mr. President, do what we can, let all the civilized nations of the world do what they can, yet thousands upon thousands of people will starve before we can furnish relief. It is impossible to bring to the stricken people of Russia the relief that will prevent starvation.

Now, what is the condition? At the close of this great war the commissions of all of the allied nations have assembled in Paris to meet those of the opposing nations. We also have in Paris the allied committee, which during the last few months of the war was such an important factor in uniting the forces of the four great powers in order to meet the onslaughts of the German Empire. We acted in this fight as one great force, one great nation, each being inspired by the same desire and the same hope to bring about the same object. What have they done? Senators, let me read to you again the resolutions adopted in Paris, and then if any Senator wishes to say that we shall not vote this credit it will rest upon his conscience:

The following resolutions, adopted Sunday, January 12, at meeting of supreme council of supply and relief, were presented yesterday at the meeting of the presiding war council and were formally adopted by the representatives of the allied Governments and the United States:

"1. That it is imperative in the interest of humanity and for the maintenance of orderly government that relief should be given to certain European countries. It is provisionally estimated that for the furnishing of this relief till next harvest a minimum sum of $300,000,000 may be necessary, apart from the requirements of Germany, which will be separately examined.

"2. The council is of opinion that this sum of $300,000,000 should be placed at its disposal by the four associated Governments.

"3. That the financial representatives of the four Governments should consider and make recommendations to meet this expenditure.

"4. If these recommendations be accepted by the council, they should then be referred to the respective Governments for their approval."

Mr. President, that comes from the same allied council which marshaled the hosts of England, France, Italy, and the United States to meet the great final onslaught of the desperate Hun.

Mr. President, have we turned a deaf ear to the demands of that allied council before? Did we hesitate in voting millions and billions to carry on this war? Necessarily much of it was wasted. In the haste with which we made preparation, being an unprepared Nation, we, of course, wasted hundreds of millions of dollars. But whenever that allied council called on us for men, for money, for sacrifice, we met their demands, and because we did there has ended the greatest war that ever cast its shadow over civilization.

Now, Mr. President, who are the men who are to administer this allied fund? Let me read their names. They are not unknown to you or to the American people:

Lord Reading, the ambassador of Great Britain to the United States, and Sir John Beale, chairman wheat executive, London, will represent the English Government. For the French Government the representatives are Vilgrain, undersecretary of state for supply, and Clementel, minister of commerce. Italy at present is represented by Signor Attolico until her regular representatives arrive, and the United States is represented by Mr. Hoover and by Mr. Norman Davis.

I shall not discuss the question whether it would have been better not to have passed the food law or some other laws which have been enacted. I shall not discuss the record and career of Mr. Hoover. I will say that I believe him to be a high-minded, honorable, patriotic, and exceedingly able man. When Belgium had been destroyed before we entered the war and when France and England desired some one to take charge of the great charitable undertaking in feeding their people and keeping them from starvation they selected Mr. Hoover.

I do not think Mr. Hoover believes, in time of peace, in regulating prices or fixing prices or anything of the kind. At the meeting referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] Mr. Hoover recommended to the Senators present that whatever pressure might be brought to bear or whatever arguments were made the food law should expire with this war and that economically, in a country like ours, prices should not be fixed except under circumstances such as those to which we have been subjected.

Europe selected Mr. Hoover, who has had vast experience, to be the head of this commission. Not only that, Mr. President, but the representatives of this country in Paris, selected to make peace, have recommended this as a necessity; and, again, the President of this country, who is representing us at that conference, has recommended it in the most earnest manner. So we have the united judgment of the allied council, these gentlemen of the highest standing who are to act as the commissioners to handle the funds, our representatives at the peace conference, and the President of the United States.

I have followed the President in some things which were against my judgment; but I wished to place in his hands all the power which a united Nation could place there, that he might win this war, hoping that it would be the last great destructive war for generations and centuries to come.

Mr. President, I know this: The countries which are organized, the countries which have the semblance of an organized government, stand ready to issue their bonds or other securities to pay for food and aid their people. I was talking with the Minister from Serbia. Little Serbia, with all she has suffered, is ready to-day in Washington to give the bonds of the Serbian Government for every dollar of food and assistance which this allied council may furnish her. Of course, we are not going to give food to France. Belgium is ready to give her bonds, and they will be good, for it is a rich country, inhabited by an industrious people, ready to give their bonds for her aid. I have no doubt that any of the nations of Europe which are organized, which have a semblance of government, will give their securities for any assistance which may be rendered them; but, nevertheless, I have no doubt that with all this assistance there are struggling peoples in Europe over whom hang the horrors of famine, and I am not ready to say that I am going to turn a deaf ear to the piteous sobs of those broken nations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From the Senator's investigations, does he believe that the allied governments and the United States have entered into any form of contract to carry out this plan?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no doubt whatever that, as arranged and as indicated by this resolution, the council of the allied governments have agreed on a plan to furnish relief to these countries. Now, I should be glad if the committee could have had before it Mr. Hoover and representatives from these countries, who could have given us detailed information as to just what countries food may be sent or seed need be sent or clothing need be sent, and how much, and what countries will be able to pay for them or give their securities for supplies; and I believe it would have been better if more detailed information had been sent to Congress. But I do realize, Mr. President, that the war has not been at an end but a couple of months. I do realize that Europe was in chaos, and likely they do not know the complete details, which must be worked out from time to time. But, as the Senator from Michigan has just said, I have no doubt that there is an agreement between the allied nations to carry on as one body this relief to the stricken world.

Mr. President, it has been suggested that if we have a surplus of food we should appropriate that food to give to these countries and not appropriate money as a revolving fund. I should be perfectly willing, if the allied council should say at this moment, "We wish so many bushels of wheat, so many pounds of meat, and so much clothing from the United States," and we had it, to appropriate that; but I think it has occurred to every Senator that it is impossible for them to make such estimates.

Certainly the great proportion of this relief must come from this country. Do not forget, Senators, that last year the foreign commerce of this country reached the unparalleled amount of $9,000,000,000—more by three billions than any country ever before realized in any one year in all the history of the world—and that the balance of trade in favor of this country was $3,000,000,000. In other words, Europe paid us three billions more than we paid them.

Why, Mr. President, if labor is to have its just wages, as it ought, if industries are to be maintained, if the farmers of this country are to find a market for their products, that market must be found in Europe, because we are a surplus-producing people. Now, there is no question but that the Government of the United States has purchased most of the wheat surplus and paid for it, and is obligated to pay for any of the balance which is offered. I shall not go into the details of that; but we have a surplus of 319,000,000 bushels this year, and Mr. Hoover has sold to the allied countries 200,000,000 bushels at the price this Government paid for it, plus the carrying charges and expenses, and we undoubtedly will find a market for the balance; for I believe the European countries must buy their surplus wheat from us, because we are in a better position to furnish it and send it to them.

I am not in favor of keeping up the prices of products—not at all. I realize that the war is practically over. I realize that the guaranteed price of wheat was established at a time when no man could foretell the result of this war. It was made after one of the shortest wheat crops in this country and in the world. It was made when the President and the Congress felt as though there must be a greater production of wheat in order to win the war, and it was made, it must not be forgotten, when the price of wheat was $2.50 and $3 a bushel and rising every day, and it was made to insure food to the armies and the peoples of the world fighting in a common cause.

I am not in favor of maintaining that price to the American workingman and to the American people. I would prefer that the Government buy the wheat and sell it in the market, so that our own people may have the benefit of the world's price and food at normal prices; but, come what may, the Congress must keep its pledge to the farmers of this country.

Mr. President, I think I have said all that I desire to say on this bill, with one exception. I am not going to vote for it solely because it is a charity, or solely because it will stabilize the governments of Europe, or solely because it will stop the advance of bolshevism, although I do realize that in those countries where nations are seeking to realize their ambitions toward autonomy you can not set up and maintain a government over starving people; but I am going to vote for it because it is one of the factors in the closing of a great world conflict which has spread starvation, misery, disease, and want over all of Europe, and I wish to do my share and to have my country do its share in aiding to bring about an honorable peace, in maintaining good governments in Europe, and in feeding those stricken people.

I deny that by voting for this bill I commit myself to maintaining for all time the autonomy of the governments of Europe which may be established, large and small. I am not in favor of crossing the ocean to pledge the honor and strength of this Nation to maintain all the governments which may be set up in Europe; but I am in favor, at the close of this war, as to the peoples who have been fighting with us for the same object and inspired by the same hopes, of aiding them in their hour of dire peril and extremity.

And so, Mr. President, when the war clouds have rolled away and the passions of nations have cooled and we can see more clearly the future of these countries, it is my hope that the stricken peoples of Europe will form governments modeled after our own, where the right of the people to govern shall be perpetuated, and that autocratic rule shall have ended in the world.

RECESS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 24, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 23, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, profoundly sensible of our utter dependence upon Thee, we approach Thee in the sacred attitude of prayer and devotion, that we may express our gratitude for all that Thou hast done for us, as individuals and as a Nation, in the past; fervently praying that Thou wilt continue to inspire, uphold, and guide us, that we may know more of Thy will and better how to fulfill the same. In the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 390) to establish the Grand Canyon National Park in the State of Arizona.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HAWLEY, for to-day, on account of sickness.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, few people in this country know the manner or the way in which men are tried by court-martial in our Army; and although 16,000 cases have been disposed of during the past year, little or no attention has been given to the procedure and to the fact that justice has not been meted out to them.

The usual procedure is for the commanding officer of a division to direct a court-martial to assemble, with the members of that court-martial selected by him in person, convened when and where he directs the court to assemble, and although the penalty may be death, the accused soldier is permitted to plead guilty with an officer—usually a second lieutenant—assigned to him to defend him.

Few of our citizens know that on the other side four privates who were found sleeping on post were tried before courts of the kind stated by me, a second lieutenant assigned to defend these men, and in two cases a plea of guilty entered by the second lieutenant, and the convening authority requested that these men be executed, although they were only 20 years of age. The records in the cases show that the judge advocate general of the American Expeditionary Forces asked for full execution in order that other men might be deterred from sleeping on post. Luckily for these men and the good name of the Nation the attention of the President was brought to the cases, the sentences were commuted, and the men ordered back to military duty. In one case a young lad who had distinguished himself at Soissons on July 18, 19, and 20, and who received the distinguished-service cross for bravery, was found sleeping on post after having come out from a hospital. The sentence of the court was four years. The convening authority reviewed it, and then and there it ended so far as any further review of the proceedings were concerned in his case. There have been 16,000 such cases tried——

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield in this connection?

Mr. SIEGEL. Certainly.

Mr. LAZARO. Has the gentleman any information as to the number of soldiers who were condemned to death by these courts-martial?

Mr. SIEGEL. No; I have not, because it has been impossible to obtain the proper data. We know that there have been 16,000 such cases tried. We know that the chief officer in each division selects the military court, and that usually a second lieutenant is assigned to defend the accused.

Mr. LAZARO. Has the gentleman a remedy to suggest?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes. Senator CHAMBERLAIN has introduced a bill, and I have introduced a bill, providing that each case may be reviewed by a higher authority, that the accused may select his own counsel, whether civil or military, and, what is more important, that when the court is finally through and reaches its decision the defendant may then and there know whether he has been found guilty and what the sentence is. The language of the bill is as follows:

A bill to promote the administration of military justice by amending existing laws regulating trial by courts-martial, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That article 11 of the Articles of War is hereby amended to read as follows:

"ART. 11. Appointment of judge advocates: For each general or special court-martial the authority appointing the court shall appoint a judge advocate. No person shall be appointed judge advocate for a general court-martial unless at the time of his appointment he is an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department, except that where an officer of that department is not available the authority appointing the court shall appoint an officer of the Army recommended by the Judge Advocate General as specially qualified, by reason of legal learning and experience, to act as judge advocate. The officer appointed as judge advocate for a general court-martial shall not be a member of the court, but shall sit with it at all times in open session and shall fairly, impartially, and in a judicial manner perform the following duties and such others not inconsistent herewith as may be prescribed by the President in virtue of article 38 of the Articles of War:

"(a) Rule upon all questions of law properly arising in the proceedings;

"(b) Advise the court and the convening authority of any legal deficiency in the constitution and composition of the court or in the charge before it for trial;

"(c) At the conclusion of the case and before the court proceeds to deliberate upon the finding sum up the evidence in the case and discuss the law applicable to it, unless both he and the court consider it unnecessary;

"(d) Take care, equally with the court, that the accused does not suffer any disadvantage in consequence of his position as such, or of his ignorance or incapacity to present his own case, and for that purpose the judge advocate, with the permission of the court, may call and examine such witnesses as may appear to him necessary or desirable to elicit the truth.

"His rulings and advice, given in the performance of his duties and made of record, shall govern the court-martial.

"If the judge advocate dies, or from illness or any cause whatever is unable to attend, the court shall adjourn and another judge advocate shall be appointed by the proper authority, who shall act as judge advocate for the residue of the trial or until the judge advocate returns."

SEC. 2. That article 17 of the Articles of War is hereby amended to read as follows:

"ART. 17. Appointment of prosecutors: For each general or special court-martial the authority appointing the court shall appoint a prosecutor, and for each general court-martial one or more assistant prosecutors when necessary. The prosecutor of a general or special court-martial shall prosecute in the name of the United States and shall, under the direction of the court, prepare the record of its proceedings. Such prosecutor may be an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department. In all court-martial proceedings the accused shall have the assistance of and be represented by counsel of his own selection. Such counsel may be either a civilian lawyer or an officer of the Army. If military counsel be not selected by the accused, the court shall assign military counsel to assist in his defense if such counsel be reasonably available."

SEC. 3. That articles 22, 30, 33, and 116 of the Articles of War are hereby amended by substituting the word "prosecutor" for the words "judge advocate" wherever they appear in the said articles, and by substituting the words "prosecutor or any assistant prosecutor of a general or special court-martial" for the words "the judge advocate or any assistant judge advocate of a general or special court-martial" wherever they appear in the said articles.

SEC. 4. That if the authority authorized to appoint general courts-martial has an officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department present for duty on his staff, he shall not refer any charge to a general court-martial for trial unless the said officer of the Judge Advocate General's Department shall indorse in writing upon the charge that in his opinion an offense made punishable by the Articles of War is charged with legal sufficiency against the accused, and that it has been made to appear to him that there is prima facie proof that the accused is guilty of the offense charged.

SEC. 5. That article 18 of the Articles of War is hereby amended to read as follows:

"ART. 18. Challenges: Members of a general or special court-martial may be challenged by the accused, but only for cause stated to the court. The court shall determine the relevancy and validity thereof, and shall not receive a challenge to more than one member at a time: Provided, That if the accused at any time before the arraignment shall file in the proceedings an affidavit of prejudice alleging specific grounds to show that the court by reason of matters touching its constitution or composition can not do justice, the court shall proceed no further in the case, but shall report the matter to the appointing authority for his decision.

SEC. 6. That when a court-martial shall find the accused not guilty upon all charges and specifications it shall not reconsider, nor shall the appointing authority direct it to reconsider its findings; but the president of the court or the summary court shall immediately inform the accused and the officer by whose authority he may be in custody of his acquittal, and such officer shall thereupon immediately release the accused from custody, unless he is in custody for reasons other than the pendency of the charges of which he has been acquitted.

SEC. 7. That when a court-martial shall find the accused guilty, it shall forthwith inform the accused of its findings and the sentence.

SEC. 8. That section 1199, Revised Statutes of the United States, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1199. The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army. The power to revise the proceedings of courts-martial conferred upon the Judge Advocate General by this section shall be exercised only for the correction of errors of law which have injuriously affected substantial rights of an accused and shall include—

"(a) Power to disapprove a finding of guilty and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense when the record requires such finding;

"(b) Power to disapprove the whole or any part of a sentence;

"(c) Power, upon the disapproval of the whole of a sentence, to advise the proper convening or confirming authority of the further proceedings that may and should be had, if any. If upon revision, under this section, all the findings and the sentence be disapproved because of error of law in the proceedings, the convening or confirming authority may lawfully order a new trial by another court-martial.

"Sentences involving death, dismissal, or dishonorable discharge from the service shall not be executed pending revision. If in any case a sentence though valid shall appear upon revision to be unduly severe, the Judge Advocate General shall make a report and recommendation for clemency, with the reasons therefor, to the President or the military authority having power to remit or mitigate the punishment."

SEC. 9. That the Judge Advocate General of the Army shall prepare and submit to Congress, at the earliest practicable date, a revision of the Articles of War consistent with the provisions of this act, and shall also prepare and submit to Congress a draft of regulations providing for the procedure of general courts-martial.

SEC. 10. That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Over at Leavenworth 12 men were tried and the court reached a decision on the 29th of November. At the present time these 12 men do not know whether they have been sentenced to be hanged or whether they have been sentenced to imprisonment for life. An orderly had gotten into trouble with 12 of these men at this military prison, and the military court tried them, and since July 20 last these 12 men have been kept in close confinement on bread and water, as sworn to by them in their application for a writ of habeas corpus, made to the United States court in Kansas before Judge Pollock a few days ago, and they do not know whether they have been sentenced to hang. Apparently 11 of them have been sentenced to hang and one has been sentenced for life imprisonment. Not a single one of these men knows who of the 12 is to have a life sentence and who are to be hanged.

The objection raised in this case is to my mind a very good one. Their objection is that as they were prisoners at Leavenworth the military court had no authority to try them, that they were entitled to be tried by a civil jury, and that they were entitled to have a chance to be tried separately according to the rights given to them in the various States of the Union. But that is not all.

Mr. GARD. What was the charge against these men?

Mr. SIEGEL. It is charged that these 12 men got into a rumpus with an orderly and that the orderly received blows from them resulting in his death. Over 2,000 pages of testimony were taken, and two former assistant district attorneys who examined the case at my suggestion—because I have not time to go over all these records—state that there is not a scintilla of testimony connecting the majority of these men with the crime.

Mr. GARD. The charge against them is murder?

Mr. SIEGEL. The charge is murder; but what I object to is that under the present procedure the court is convened at the request of the general, who names the men who constitute the court; he is the reviewing authority; and what is more, the men themselves do not know what the sentence of the court is sometimes for weeks and sometimes for months. The effect of such treatment on the men can be readily understood by anyone who will give the matter a moment's thought.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Where was this offense alleged to have been committed?

Mr. SIEGEL. At Leavenworth.

Mr. RAKER. Were these men represented by counsel at the court-martial?

Mr. SIEGEL. Some of them were. There is a newspaper article a column and a half long from the Leavenworth Times of January 15 that has been sent to me by some citizen who complains of the gross injustice of the prevalent system. It recites all the facts I have given here and reads as follows:

WILL FILE SUIT TO STOP HANGING OF 12 MEN—PETITION PREPARED FOR HABEAS CORPUS ACTION IN FEDERAL COURT—MILITARY TRIAL ILLEGAL—IMPORTANT ACTION TO BE TAKEN BEFORE JUDGE POLLOCK TODAY RELATIVE TO THE 12 PRISONERS CONVICTED OF MURDERING SHELBY HISLE—CHARGE THAT THEY ARE UNDERGOING CRUEL PUNISHMENT IN SOLITARY CONFINEMENT UNDERGROUND AT THE DISCIPLINARY BARRACKS.

A habeas corpus suit to prevent the probable hanging of 12 prisoners in the disciplinary barracks will be filed before Judge John C. Pollock in the United States district court in Kansas City, Kans., to-day. The petition was prepared and sworn to here yesterday and is ready for filing in court. One Leavenworth and four outside lawyers have been at work on the preparation of the petition for several days, and it is an unusual one.

The petitioners are 12 men—Francis J. Cooney, Donald Fisher, Robert L. Lecoco, Alexander Kahn, Harold J. Keyes, Abraham Garelick, William Schleman, George W. Jerue, William F. Peters, William Cook, George A. Polson, and Millard Bowers—all of whom were convicted by court-martial at Fort Leavenworth in November of murdering general prisoner Shelby Hisle at the disciplinary barracks on the night of July 29.

ALLEGE CRUEL PUNISHMENT.

The petition starts out by saying that Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, and Col. Sedgwick Rice, commandant of the disciplinary barracks, are holding these 12 petitioners without authority of law in solitary confinement underneath the surface of the earth at the disciplinary barracks, and that in doing this they are violating the eighth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the infliction of cruel and unusual punishment.

The petition then goes on to recite the orders of the War Department for the assembling of the court-martial here by Secretary of War Baker, and it states that on November 4 these 12 men were forcibly dragged before this court, and, in spite of their protests, they were placed on trial before an illegal tribunal that had no right to try them on a murder charge. The jurisdiction of the court-martial is questioned on several grounds. One of the errors alleged is that the court-martial ruled over their protests to try them jointly, when they had a right to have separate trials on a murder charge.

NOT AT WAR HERE.

It is alleged that the court-martial had no right to try them for murder, because the ninety-second article of war prohibited the trial of any person for murder by court-martial within the geographical limits of the United States in time of peace, and that the United States and the district of Kansas were at peace within their borders in July, 1918.

It is further alleged that the 12 men had been discharged as soldiers of the American Army; that they were not in the military service, but were prisoners in confinement and were not subject to trial by court-martial.

It is set out that they should have been tried in the civil courts, which were open and ready to conduct a just trial. Also that they had a right to a trial by a jury, and they ask Judge Pollock to issue an order to have them brought into his court so that they will get a fair and impartial trial.

HISLE KILLED BY A FALL.

It is stated that the trial continued until November 25, when the court-martial, without evidence to justify it, convicted them of killing Shelby Hisle by striking, hitting, stamping, and cutting him with a knife, but that his death was the direct result of a fall which caused his head to come in contact with an iron bar, causing a fracture of the skull, from which Hisle died.

It is alleged that the trial by court-martial of these 12 men was a usurpation of judicial power in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The articles of the Constitution alleged to be violated are set out.

FEAR A QUICK EXECUTION.

It is then stated that the petitioners have reason to believe that they have been sentenced to death or imprisonment for life, and in the event of the approval of said illegal sentences that they are in danger of being executed without having an opportunity to obtain relief from the sentences or to obtain a writ of habeas corpus. In other words, they are in fear of the sentences being carried out before they have a chance to appeal or secure any relief whatever.

An order is asked for directing Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, and Col. Sedgwick Rice, prison commandant, to take these men out of their present cruel solitary confinement and to have them brought into the Federal court forthwith, where arrangements can be made to give them a fair trial.

IN SOLITARY SINCE JULY.

Seventeen prisoners were tried at one time by court-martial at Fort Leavenworth last November and 12 of them were convicted. Five who were acquitted were restored to ordinary prison duty. These 12 were in solitary confinement from July 29 to the time of the trial, and when it concluded they were returned to the same solitary rooms in the basement of a cell house.

The prisoners and their relatives and friends have been fearful that they would be executed quietly some morning before they would have a chance to do anything for them. The colored soldiers executed in Texas by the military authorities were not given any chance to make an appeal or have anything done in their behalf.

Nothing is known here about the verdict. When the trial ended the judge advocate of the court took the verdict direct to Washington and placed it with Secretary of War Baker. Members of a court-martial take a solemn oath not to reveal anything about a verdict or the way any member of the court voted on conviction.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Under military law these men are entitled to a copy of the proceedings.

Mr. SIEGEL. That is true; they are entitled to a copy of the proceedings. They were tried November 29, yet they do not know to this hour which one of them is to be hung and which one has a life sentence.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman know whether or not the department refuses to give any information until the case is reviewed finally?

Mr. SIEGEL. The department does not, and my attention has been called to another fact, that the colored men in Texas were convicted, and then the review of the case took place after the execution.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Are these men colored men?

Mr. SIEGEL. No; all white men from all over the country.

Mr. DYER. This is a sort of a lynch law they are trying to get into the Army?

Mr. SIEGEL. I would not call it exactly lynch law, but 16,000 men have been tried in that way. I called your attention a few minutes ago to the Mathias case, where a boy got the distinguished bravery cross for bravery at Soissons, and at this time after he had been sentenced to four years it may be possible that he is in some disciplinary camp; in other words, his mother can not find out where he is. The Marine Corps has tried to get the information and can not. All the men tried on the other side were tried under Army regulations and Army rules, and the Marine Corps does not know where the boy is, and his mother in New York does not know where he is at the present time.

Now, I might go on and call attention to a number of other cases along similar lines. There are thousands of these cases.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is there any uniformity as to the amount of punishment in cases throughout the Army camps?

Mr. SIEGEL. There is no uniformity that I know of. We all know that. Men will be sentenced two years for a minor offense, while others will be sentenced for 10 or 15 years. The general in command of the division has supreme authority. He orders the court assembled and selects the men to try the accused, and if the general is not satisfied with the sentence he can reconvene the court. The most objectionable feature of the whole proposition is that the accused does not know, after the court has acted, if it finds him guilty, what the sentence is, and he may be kept for months without knowing what the final outcome is.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Has not the accused the right, under the law, to a report of the findings of the court-martial?.

Mr. SIEGEL. He has practically no rights at all under military law as it stands to-day. All he has is the right to a report of the proceedings, but the proceedings stop at the time the court goes into secret session to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. In the admirable presentation of the matter by the gentleman, has he discussed the difference between a court-martial on the firing line in time of actual war and at home in a country like this where there is really no war?

Mr. SIEGEL. I have not discussed it, because the same procedure is adopted, whether on the other side or over here. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks on this most important question the following article from the New York World of Sunday, January 19, 1919, discloses part of the conditions to which I have called attention:

THE THING THAT IS CALLED MILITARY JUSTICE—CONCRETE OFFICIAL EVIDENCE WHICH ESTABLISHES THAT THE UNITED STATES MILITARY COURTS-MARTIAL INDORSE AND APPROVE OF OPPRESSION AND ARBITRARILY IMPOSE GROSS INJUSTICE—WHENCE COMES THE LAW WHICH MAKES THIS POSSIBLE?—FROM CONGRESS—IT HAS ITS ORIGIN IN MEDIAEVAL TIMES, BUT ITS BLUNDERING HARSHNESS NO LONGER OBTAINS IN FRANCE, ENGLAND, ITALY, OR BELGIUM—DATA FOUND IN THE 1918 RECORDS IN WASHINGTON, TO WHICH ACCESS WAS HAD BY THE AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

(By Rowland Thomas.)

In November, 1917, 12 old and excellent noncommissioned officers of the United States Army were tried by general court-martial at a camp in Texas. The charge was mutiny, a military offense so grave that the punishment prescribed in the Articles of War is "death or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct."

These men had been engaged in a camp amusement prohibited by a standing order. A young officer, finding them thus occupied and being overquick to assert his authority, ordered them in arrest instead of contenting himself with an admonition. While the men were in arrest he ordered them to drill. That order was in conflict with a general Army regulation which directs that noncommissioned officers in arrest shall attend no formations. The 12 noncoms knew that and declined to put themselves in the position of violating a general regulation.

Upon their respectful refusal to drill they were summarily stripped of their insignia of rank and placed in the guardhouse. The charge of mutiny was preferred against them. They were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and imprisonment at hard labor for terms ranging from 10 years up to 25. The commanding officer, who had appointed the court, reviewed and approved its findings and ordered its sentence executed. And from his arbitrary decision the 12 accused had no appeal whatsoever to any judicial power.

These 12 men had been mistried. They were, prima facie, innocent of the crime for which they had been accused and convicted. Mutiny, by the definition given in the official Manual for Courts-Martial, "imports collective insubordination and necessarily includes some combination of two or more persons in resisting lawful military authority." These 12 old soldiers had not resisted lawful military authority. On the contrary, the act for which they found themselves "broken" and in penal servitude had been an act of upholding lawful military authority—one of the general regulations of the United States Army—against the infraction of a lawless or ignorant officer of that Army.

The other day I brought this case to the attention of an able and very distinguished member of the American bar. "Considering all those facts," I asked him, "do you see any shading of phrases by which a sane man, lawyer or layman, could seriously refer to any part of that transaction as representing the administration of any sort of justice?"

"On the contrary," was his answer, "what you have cited, were it true, would be a perfect example of the arbitrary imposition of injustice. But do you mean to tell me that happened in our Army?"

"By authority granted me personally by the Secretary of War," I answered him, "I have inspected the legal record of that case. What I have told you is its undisputed substance. The record is in the Mills Building, in the files of what we call our Bureau of Military Justice."

THE BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

The Mills Building is in Washington, just across Seventeenth Street from the State, War, and Navy Building. In it are the offices of the Judge Advocate General's Department, which is charged with responsibility for legal matters arising in the Military Establishment of the United States, just as the Medical Department is charged with the equally technical matters of cure and hygiene. And one section of the Judge Advocate General's Department is called the Bureau of Military Justice.

In military justice you—if among the 4,000,000 men who now compose our Army you count a son, a brother, husband, kinsman, friend, or friend's friend or kinsman—have a more immediate and vital personal interest than you probably realize. For on the administration of American military justice depend at this very moment and at every moment while he is in the service the good name, the future prospects, the liberty, and possibly the life of the individual soldier you gave to your country.

In those offices in the Mills Building are preserved the records of 15,719 grave crises which recently arose in the lives of an equal number of American soldiers. They are the harvest of the one calendar year of 1918. And every last one of those almost 16,000 potential and mostly actual personal disasters arose through the working out of the theories and practices of American military justice.

Through the authority granted me by the Secretary of War, I last week inspected a representative portion of those records.

Those 15,719 documents were records of 15,719 cases tried by general court-martial in the United States Army, one year's increment in the process of what is trustingly referred to as the administration of military justice. The Judge Advocate General is the technical law officer of our military establishment. Therefore, presumably, the public assumes that this must be matter of law, and so matter of justice.

Matter of law it is in one way. It is something legalized by action of Congress. But though the right and duty of captains and sergeants to give certain authorized commands under certain authorized circumstances have also been legalized by Congress, and they therefore might also be called matters of law in that meaningless sense, no one ever confuses them with matters of justice. They are described and recognized always as matters of military authority and command. And so should be described and recognized the matters which come up to the Judge Advocate General's office in the form of records of courts-martial.

COURTS-MARTIAL SENTENCES AT PRESENT MERELY MILITARY COMMANDS.

In the course of a speech in the United States Senate recently Senator CHAMBERLAIN said:

"The records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military law or system of administering military justice which is worthy of the name of law or justice. We have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer."

If that statement, made on the floor of the senior legislative body of the Nation by the chairman of the United States Senate's Committee on Military Affairs is true, it raises an issue of grave importance. If it is supported by facts, it raises this question: Shall courts-martial in the United States Army sit as mere instrumentalities of military command or shall they sit as courts of justice, administering the law of the land?

And the Senator's statement is fully and amply supported by facts, which my investigation of the records showed. It will be shown you here that while the administration of military justice has been at times progressive and at other times reactionary, like most other phases of human government, it is at this time in this country almost wholly reactionary. It will be shown that though the Bureau of Military Justice in the Judge Advocate General's Department is nominally at the head of the administration of military justice, it is only nominally at the head. It is without legal authority. It does no more than "recommend to a military superior," usually the Chief of Staff, who then exercises his military power of supervision and direction over these recommendations. Under the General Staff act, as construed in present practice, the Chief of Staff exercises the same command over the Judge Advocate General's Department as over the Supply Department. Thereby he has the power to differ, and he does differ, with the head of the Bureau of Military Justice upon matters of pure law and substitutes instead his own judgment, even though that substitution should extend, as in that mutiny case in Texas, to the point of ordering that, for the purposes of command, wrong shall be right, truth shall be falsehood, innocence shall be guilt, and obedience shall be insubordination.

THE POWER OF MILITARY COMMAND.

It will be shown you that in the United States Army at present judicial power is only a concomitant and incident of military power. It is military power alone which determines whether an enlisted man shall be subjected to court-martial. By virtue of the power of command, the military commander determines the sufficiency of the charge and of the evidence upon which a man shall be tried, and other similar legal questions. By power of command he details the court-martial and passes on all questions of law arising in the proceedings and all questions of the legality of the proceedings. By power of command he determines the legality of the sentence and orders it executed. All this without independent legal direction or supervision, except that to be found in the "recommendations" of the Judge Advocate General, who is himself subject to superior military authority.

Further still it will be shown you how, from examination of those records which the Secretary of War formally gave me authority to examine, that, even inside the Judge Advocate General's Department there is an irreconcilable difference of opinion about the proper answer to that tremendous question raised by Senator CHAMBERLAIN—whether in our Army we shall have military law and a system of administering military justice worthy of the names of law and justice, or whether we shall have simply a method of giving effect by courts-martial to the more or less arbitrary discretion of commanding officers. It was clearly evident from official "recommendations" attached to various cases, that in the Judge Advocate General's Department there is a school which believes in the theory that courts-martial are mere instrumentalities of military command, that this is the view of the Judge Advocate General himself, Gen. Crowder, but is not the view held by the officer who, throughout the war, has been Acting Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, nor by most of the officers of the department.

At the beginning of the war the Judge Advocate General's Department consisted of less than a score of officers. It now consists of about 400 officers who have come to it as distinguished lawyers from civil life. These lawyers, I discovered from official indorsements and memoranda attached to records of cases, have found the system not merely antiquated but one admitting on frequent occasions gross injustice and military oppression. Courts-martial try soldiers for all offenses from murder down. They are composed of Army officers ignorant of the rudiments of law; yet, under the present practice of the War Department, their judgments, when approved by their camp commander, are final. And the present Judge Advocate General not only believes that the law makes such judgments final but that the law is wise. In one case, in which his views were strenuously opposed by the officers of his own department, he said that military justice was a kind of justice that had to be administered in the camp by the camp commander without legal supervision. This attitude resulted in the denial of the existence of any power in the War Department to correct error committed during these crude trials, though the error might be as prejudicial and unjust to the accused as that committed during the Texas "mutiny" trial. At the outbreak of the war the assistants in the Judge Advocate General's office, appreciating the need of a remedy for such gross wrong, endeavored to revive the revisory power over courts-martial proceedings believed by them clearly to be found in statutes of the Civil War period. The Judge Advocate General himself, though conceding the frequent gross injustice, denied the existence of such a power.

Notwithstanding that attitude, those who have guided the office of the Judge Advocate General since that time and throughout the war have assumed that remedial power must reside somewhere and in some cases of the grossest injustice have succeeded in inducing the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War to take remedial action.

The task of persuasion was probably made possible for them by a single timely though tragic incident. Shortly after the Judge Advocate General's Department had strenuously denied to itself the power of review, 13 negro soldiers in Texas were tried, convicted, and were hanged the day after their conviction was reported to the convening authority and approved and confirmed by him. The record of the proceeding in those cases was not forwarded to the Judge Advocate General's Department for the "revision" required by the statute—whatever that term may mean when the power of effective review is self-denied by him—until three months after those 13 negroes had paid the forfeit of their lives. It is important to note here the fact that the camp commander who thus, by the power of military command, made himself accuser, jury, judge, and executioner of those 13 men was the same commander destined later, in the case of the "mutinous" noncoms, to order that inside his jurisdiction right should be wrong.

THE THEORY OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

But, first, a little clearing of the ground is necessary. Just what is military justice? What is a general court-martial?

Military justice, of course, is the process of putting military law into effective action. And military law is the legal system which regulates the government of the Military Establishment. Military law in the United States derives its existence from special constitutional grants of power, and is both written and unwritten. Its written sources are the Articles of War; other statutory enactments of Congress relating to the military service; the Army Regulations; and general and special orders and decisions promulgated by the War Department and by department, post, and other commanders.

Its criminal code of procedure is embodied in the Articles of War, which, as enacted by Congress on August 29, 1916, in their present form, consist of 121 articles which, among other matters, define the limits of military jurisdiction, provide the military tribunals through which that jurisdiction shall be exercised, define the offenses for which persons subject to military law shall be brought to trial before these tribunals, and the punishments they shall suffer if found guilty.

Chief of the criminal tribunals of our American military legal system is the general court-martial, which is given power to try a soldier on practically every charge that can be brought against a human being, and power to sentence him, if found guilty, to extremely severe punishment. Death, or such other punishment as a court-martial may direct, is the penalty prescribed by 13 of the so-called punitive articles, and such punishment as a court-martial may direct under 29 others. "Such punishment as a court-martial may direct," in the case of a soldier and in a "time of war" like the present, may be dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances due or to become due during an indicated period of time, and imprisonment at hard labor for any period up to life.

WHAT A GENERAL COURT-MARTIAL IS.

A general court-martial is a body of officers, numbering from 5 to 13, the direct appointees of a properly authorized military commander, generally the commanding officer of certain specified military units or areas. It meets, by order of this commander, to try any person whom he orders tried on any charge or charges he may order preferred against that person. The prosecution of the accused is conducted by an officer ordered by the same commanding officer to perform that duty, and called a judge advocate, while the accused is given the right to be represented by counsel of his own selection "if such counsel be reasonably available." Since "civilian counsel will not be provided at the expense of the Government," counsel for the accused is always in practice a line officer, not a lawyer, and generally junior in grade and immature in human experience, who is ordered by the commander who appoints the court to perform the duty of counsel for the defense. He is, if his services be "reasonably available," an officer requested by the accused, and as to his availability the commanding officer has the final decision.

Before a court so constituted, and by a prosecutor and defender so equipped and so appointed, the accused is tried, all questions of law—including pleas, motions, and objections—arising during the proceedings being determined by majority secret vote of the members. After the evidence has been introduced and the statement of the accused and the arguments of prosecuting judge advocate and defending "counsel" have been heard, the court again by majority secret vote, determines its finding on the law and facts. If the finding is "guilty," it then, by majority secret vote, determines the sentence to be imposed, and from this judgment, when duly approved or confirmed, no appeal can be taken, nor can the judgment be set aside or reviewed by the courts of the United States nor of any State.

Such final approval or confirmation—except in capital and a few other specified cases—is the act of the commanding officer who appointed the court, and who, as reviewing authority, has the express power to confirm or disapprove the findings or any part thereof, the express power to confirm or disapprove any part of the sentence, and the power to send the case back to the court for "reconsideration." The final action of the reviewing authority is ordinarily published by promulgation of a "general court-martial order," and after this order has been promulgated the action of the reviewing authority is beyond recall.

SOLDIERS STAND OUTSIDE THE CONSTITUTIONAL GUARANTEES.

All your life you have been safeguarded in certain respects by certain fundamental provisions so complete and so effective that the chances are you never completely realized their existence unless you happen to be a lawyer. You have been so safe you have taken your safety for granted, as you take the daily procession of light and darkness. Under amendments 5 and 6 of the Constitution you, as a citizen of the United States, can not "be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury." You can not "be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." If you become the subject of any criminal prosecution you "enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury—and to have the assistance of counsel"—which last provision has been interpreted, over and over again, to mean the substantial assistance of qualified counsel.

Those are the inviolable safeguards of the life and liberties of every citizen of this country, "except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger." Then everything is changed.

Then any citizen of this country, if he has made himself, or has been made, subject to military law, may be arraigned for a crime which is always potentially infamous and frequently is capital, by order of a single individual. And, having been so arraigned, he will be tried, both on fact and law, not by an impartial jury but by a body of military superiors, and with no substantial assistance of counsel in his defense.

"Consider what has happened in the case of a soldier found guilty and sentenced under a general court-martial order. He has been accused and ordered to trial by a man who is not a lawyer. He has been arraigned and tried before a body of laymen. All legal questions arising during his trial have been settled by a secret vote of those laymen. All evidence for and against him has been admitted or rejected by the same process. The question of fact—the question of his guilt or innocence on the strength of the evidence admitted—has been decided by another secret vote of that body of laymen, without competent judicial guidance. And the laymen, in case their finding was guilty, have determined by secret vote what punishment he shall suffer. The record of their action has been sent to the layman by whom they were appointed, and that layman, at his own discretion, has approved or disapproved their findings and sentence, perhaps a revised finding and sentence, given after 'reconsideration' of his order. And that layman's decision is absolutely final. From it there is no appeal to any person or body."

And now, how do our commanding officers exercise that enormous power? How does the system work out in the day-to-day practice which brings the records of 15,719 general courts-martial cases to the Mills Building as the grist of one year's grinding of the mills of "military justice"?

THE FOUR DEATH CASES FROM FRANCE.

We have already seen how it worked out in the cases of those 12 noncoms in Texas whose commanding officer ordered prima facie innocence to be guilt for the occasion and hanged 13 negroes three months before the legal record of their trial reached the responsible law officer of the Army, who, though he had no power to review the proceedings in the sense of ordering them revised or set aside, was expressly charged with the duty of examining their legality and, by a "recommendation," calling the attention of his military superiors to any points inconsonant with law or justice.

Let us go further. Here are other illuminating cases. All are taken from the official records in the Judge Advocate General's Department:

During last winter in France four men—four boys, of whom the eldest had barely reached 20—were court-martialed and sentenced to be "shot to death with musketry," two for sleeping on post in a front-line trench and two for disobeying an order to drill. Notwithstanding the seriousness of the charges preferred, both carrying the death penalty, the military authorities convened an inexperienced court of minimum membership, the majority lieutenants recently commissioned. A second lieutenant without any knowledge of law was assigned to the "defense." The two soldiers charged with disobedience this "learned counsel" permitted to plead guilty to a capital offense, though at the same time the accused made a statement inconsistent with this plea—to the effect that because of long exposure for many days before to the intense cold of the mountainous section of France it was physically impossible for them to drill. Upon their plea alone these two were sentenced to death.

The two charged with sleeping on post were tried by the same court and "defended" by the same "counsel." They pleaded not guilty and made a formal but ineffective defense. It was shown in evidence, however, and not denied by the Government, that the accused had been in the front-line trench for six nights from 5 o'clock in the evening until 7 in the morning, with an actual stand in sentry post of two hours on and one off. No sleeping could be had in such a brief respite, and night after night of such vigilance must bring exhaustion unless there is a chance for sleep during the short day period. It was testified, and not denied, that it was impossible to sleep in the dugout during the day, because it was used as a place for chopping wood. Furthermore, in one case, the evidence of exhaustion was very convincing, in that the accused had been found asleep once earlier in the evening, about 8 o'clock, and instead of being relieved by the corporal of the guard had been kept on duty, with the result that he was found dozing as he stood against the trench parapet with his rifle to his shoulder at about 4 in the morning.

These matters of extenuation the court made no effort to prove or disprove and should therefore have taken as true. The men were sentenced to be shot to death.

Before the four men could be shot the cases had to come to Washington for action by the President, who in this case was the confirming authority, and the Chief of Staff, and, by formality and courtesy before the Judge Advocate General for his examination and forceless "recommendation." They did so come, and the Judge Advocate General and the Chief of Staff both recommended that the President should uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing and execute the men—the Judge Advocate General stating that it would be unfortunate if the War Department could not agree upon the penalty in those cases.

With the record of those cases I found filed a memorandum written by a high officer of the department who strongly dissented with the Judge Advocate General in this view. As this dissenter is both an officer of the highest personal repute in the Army and a lawyer whose learning and ability are fully recognized at the bar, it is worth while to note the main points of his position. He said that the same court could not fairly try these four men; that the accused had not had their right of substantial assistance of counsel; that they were young (all under 20, and all volunteers); that their military experience had been brief; and that not one of them had made the slightest fight for his life. Such a defense as each had made, he declared, was not worthy of the name, and the trial in the cases was a travesty. He pointed out, too, that Gen. Pershing showed extreme insistence that the death sentences be executed for the sake of example to the Army. Upon this point the dissenter wrote:

"There is an insistence upon the part of Gen. Pershing which tends to prejudice these cases. He seems to have forgot that he is not the reviewing authority. The relation between the appointing authority and the President in these cases is judicial. I do not say that Gen. Pershing may not make recommendations as to the maintenance of discipline in his command; I know he may; but his recommendation in these four cases is a special thing, specially interposed in the course of justice, in a special case, and characterized by great insistence. He asks that he be advised by cable of the act of confirmation, and makes a powerful argument that they should die, the gist of which is after all to be found in his view of the necessity of exemplary punishment in these cases. It may be that punishment, made especially drastic for the purpose of example, at times has its place and value, but exemplary punishment is dangerous to justice. The execution of all military offenders would very likely decrease the number of future offenses and offenders, but such Draconian methods would destroy justice, without which all else in human society is of no worth.

"It is only right for me to say to you," concluded the dissenter, "that the military mind will, in my opinion, almost unanimously approve of confirmation in these cases. I do not say that the military feature is to be ignored by the Commander in Chief of the Army. I myself would not ignore it. But when it offends my well-considered sense of law and justice, I could not follow it."

The "military mind" did approve of confirmation, but the Secretary of War finally came to the partial relief of these soldiers. Two were pardoned. The punishment of the other two, those who had refused to drill, was commuted to three years' penal servitude. In his formal communication to the President as Commander in Chief, recommending this exercise of clemency, Secretary Baker raised two points worth noting. Discussing the death penalty as a military punishment, he said:

"It is fair to assume it arose in time and under circumstances quite different from these, when men were impressed into armies to fight for causes in which they had little interest or knowledge, and when their conduct was controlled without their consent by those who assumed to have more or less arbitrary power over them."

And in commenting on the degree of guilt of the two men who refused to drill he points out a circumstance to which no reference appears in any part of the record of their actual trial—that their company commander was an individual whose notorious and violent pro-German sympathies and open objection to fighting against Germany in the Army of the United States, though he bore its commission and lived on its money, later led to his court-martial, dismissal from the service, and sentence to 25 years' penal servitude. Should not, the Secretary asks, this circumstance have been taken into account by the court in weighing the heinousness of the disobedience of these two boys, and could as high a degree of discipline be justly expected of them as of men whose superiors set them a proper example?

TWO CASES OF "DESERTION."

These, of course, are extreme cases, having to do with military offenses committed in the face of the enemy. Let us take some nearer home.

There was a soldier in a camp in Alabama, with a wife and aged parents. He had an excellent record. In December, 1917, he went home on a three days' pass and found his father desperately ill. He remained home until some time in May. The evidence, unimpeached, showed that his people were very poor and in extreme need of his help; that he expected his father's death at any time; that he wore his uniform and made no effort to conceal himself, and at all times intended to return to his command. In May the father died. Two days thereafter the soldier reported to camp to resume his duties. He was tried for desertion, found guilty, and sentenced to 15 years.

This case is one of a class numbering hundreds which all show courts-martial convicting of desertion when the essence of the military crime—the specific intent to desert, the definite intention never to return to duty—is negatived by the evidence. There are many cases where the evidence shows plainly that boys went home only for a last visit before embarking for foreign service, or for the holidays, or to meet some urgent domestic situation. Such are clearly cases of absence without leave—not the desertion which is, in time of war, a capital offense.

"Too many trivial cases are sent to trial," said Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, in the Senate, "too many unduly severe sentences are imposed, and the punishments awarded for similar offenses vary too widely." That the reader may have an opportunity to judge of that for himself, here is another of these cases of "desertion," this one from Camp Upton, N. Y. It will show, if nothing else, how completely the fate of an accused and convicted soldier is in the hands of the officer who ordered his court-martial.

This soldier was tried for desertion last fall, it being specified that he had left his organization without leave on July 19 and had been absent therefrom until September 19, when he was apprehended by the civil police and turned over to the military authorities. At his trial the following matters were put forward in his defense and no attempt was made to disprove them. About three days before his "desertion" he received word that his youngest sister, whose particular friend, supporter, and counselor he had been, was dying in Bellevue Hospital. He asked for a pass to New York, explaining his reason. After waiting three days in vain he left camp without a pass, and reached the city to find that his sister had died three hours before his arrival. It was found that she had let her small insurance policy lapse and the immediate problem of giving her decent burial arose.

The accused and his brothers and sisters possessed among them one Liberty bond, which an undertaker finally agreed to accept in payment for his services. After that harassing experience the accused was immediately faced with another. The woman with whom he had lived for several years and who was the mother of his two children was his common-law wife. She had had trouble in obtaining the allotments made her from his pay, with the result that she was in dire need, and the feeding and clothing of the children had necessarily been neglected. To top all, her mother, always hostile to the couple because of their irregular marital relation, had threatened to report the condition of the children and have them taken by the Gerry Society. And the young couple knew that since they were not legally husband and wife they stood very slight chance of getting their children back if once they were taken away.

Under these circumstances the young man sought and obtained work at his trade of coal handling and worked at it all summer. The evidence showed that he made no effort to disguise his status, wearing his uniform frequently, though never when it would be exposed to the dust and grime of a coal yard, and that when it was left in his dwelling no attempt was made to conceal it. The evidence also showed that he and the woman made constant effort to find a position wherein she might support herself and the children, and that as soon as such a position had been secured he instantly made preparations to return to his duty at the camp. When he was apprehended his uniform had actually been cleaned and pressed by a tailor in order that he might make a soldierly appearance when he reported back.

In Alabama, you remember, such an offender, with very similar mitigating circumstances, was found guilty of desertion and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for 15 years. It seems reassuring and heartening, for the moment, to learn that in New York the charge against the soldier was reduced by the court to absence without leave and the penalty to confinement for six months, later reduced by the reviewing authority to one month. But is it so very heartening, after all? It is good to be thus assured that we have just and merciful men among the officers in our Army. But should that blind us to the fact that there is no power compelling them to be just and merciful, and that even mitigating and extenuating circumstances must mitigate and extenuate, if at all, only by their arbitrary decision, just as it proved, in the case of those "mutineers" in Texas, that innocence itself must change to guilt when a commanding officer gave a military order to that effect? Is that justice? Is it law?

COMMANDERS ISSUE ORDER FOR "JUDICIAL" SEVERITY.

Touching on this matter of "desertions," the file of orders which I found in the Judge Advocate General's Department in Washington shows that at some camps in the United States the military commander has ordered that absence without leave for 24 hours shall be submitted to a special court-martial, which has a punishing power of six months' confinement and forfeiture of six months' pay, and that cases of more than five days' absence shall be submitted to a general court-martial, with unlimited power to punish, and that in such cases the camp commanders have instructed the courts to punish such cases with severity.

The files also show that frequently when courts acquit, the convening authority—i. e., the commanding officer—sends the cases back for "reconsideration," with an argument which, coming from the very source of command, virtually compels a conviction, and that there are many cases tried where every legal or other consideration only goes to show that the trial was a result of a gross abuse of military power. With citation of one more human document, this phase of the discussion may be brought to a close. This also is a case from Camp Upton, tried last fall. The charge was absence without leave, the specification, such an absence lasting from July 1 to September 11, when the accused reported back for duty. The plea was not guilty; the finding of the court was guilty. The sentence imposed was dishonorable discharge, forfeiture of all pay and allowances due or to become due, and five years' imprisonment at hard labor. The action of the reviewing authority was a reduction of the imprisonment to three years and suspension of the dishonorable discharge until that term had been served.

The evidence introduced in behalf of the accused, and not only unimpeached but strongly corroborated, was that the young man, who had been a year in the service and proved a cheerful and dutiful soldier, with a strong desire to get overseas, had been in civil life the main support of an ailing mother, a sister, and three younger brothers, the father being a drunkard, who did not live at home but was in the habit of returning there whenever he indulged in one of his periodical sprees, and setting out to wreck the place, the only member of the family able to exercise any control over him at such times being this elder brother, William.

Between the incubus of this condition in the home he had left behind him and the repeated disappointments after a year in camp of being several times ordered to an overseas detachment and then having the embarkation order rescinded, the accused, as he told the court, "got kind of discouraged all round," and on July 1, having failed to secure a pass, went home without one, to find his father on a spree and his mother in bed with weakness and nervous dread. And in that home, standing between that mother and that father, the young man spent the summer.

He wore his uniform, and did not make any attempt to disguise or conceal his status. Nay, more, he took up with an official and semi-military organization, the home branch of the American Red Cross, the question of finding some adequate means of controlling his father and protecting his mother, short of arrest, the social disgrace of which he was not willing to have his family undergo. This part of his statement was corroborated by the following telegram of the Red Cross to the court which was trying him:

"William ——— (address), overstayed last furlough on account of father on periodical spree. William alone able to control father at such times. Concealed fact prolonged furlough from mother, who is anxious and sickly."

What criminal lawyer would ask to face a judge and jury with a more moving plea for a client? And what upright district attorney—sworn officer of the court to see that substantial justice is done between the State and the erring individual—would not be strongly moved to enter a nolle pros?

What happened during the administration of "military justice"? Amateur "counsel" for the defense summed up these circumstances colorlessly and briefly, humbly admitted that the man he was "defending" had committed a most grave offense, and politely, almostly timidly, asked the court to take the matter of the drunken father into consideration, and, if it could, not to be too hard on the drunken father's son.

Judge advocate for the United States indulged in a burst of oratory. What he said illustrates so well what it is not unfair to term the animus of the military mind that it is repeated here verbatim.

"As I understand counsel, the accused's difficulty in getting a week-end pass led him to be absent for two and a half months. It must have been a great difficulty that he expected to meet when he met his company commander if he had in mind asking for a pass for the entire months of July and August and the first 10 days of September. I can not believe that a man whose one desire is to get overseas to fight for his country is going to be heartbroken at his failure to get over there at the first possible moment. The fact that a man stays absent for two and a half months indicates that he is a deserter. He is charged with absence without leave, but it is the most serious absence without leave that you could possibly have—without any justification, except that there was a drunken father in the family. I think the man should be punished and punished severely."

Five years for William, the civilian in uniform who "got sort of discouraged all around," and then the machinery of our administration of military "justice" took into its maw the next case of those 15,719.

DISCIPLINE IN OTHER ARMIES.

Case after case of similar mold might be added here if space were available. It should be stated definitely, as a part of this record, that from the historic point of view that the so-called military justice of these United States of ours, besides being blundering and senseless, is archaic—the sole survivor in any decent nation of a system of military discipline which originated in medieval times and was brought to its full flower by that ardent democrat, Gustavus Adolphus. This system has been abandoned by France, by England, by Italy, by little Belgium, and the spirit and discipline which said "They shall not pass" at Verdun, which turned the surviving tenth of the "contemptibles" after that fortnight of slaughter and retreat into the offensive force which smashed the German right for Joffre, which swept the routed Italian armies back to victory, which kept the black and red and yellow of Belgium flying for years never to be forgotten over one small, miserable stretch of marsh and sand dune, were founded on quite a different concept—one which recognized the laws of the land and the rights of men and the fundamentals of justice as being always superior to any mere power of military command, however exalted and however necessitous.

It was all this and more that Senator Chamberlain had in mind when on the floor of the Senate of the United States he said:

"The records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military law or system of administering military justice which is worthy of the names of law and justice. We have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer."

The American people want to see fair play for their fighting men. They confidently look to Congress to see that these cases are reviewed by an impartial judge and justice done.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to a statement in a newspaper, because statements of a similar character are being made and printed throughout the country.

This newspaper article is headed "Certain rich men in the State watched. Cashing in war stamps, and as result are denounced as deserters":

It is stated by Charles H. Huddleston, assistant postmaster at Austin, that an enormous amount of war-savings stamps are being cashed in by the people of Texas.

This officeholder, after having abused the people for cashing their obligations against the Government, says:

If a man in uniform deserts, he is court-martialed and punished as well as disgraced for life, but these financial deserters, whose duty is to furnish funds just as truly as it is the soldier's duty to fight, can desert and go unpunished save for the lashings of their own conscience and the indignation of an outraged soldiery.

Mr. Chairman, I presume it is the wish of every American citizen to uphold the credit of our Government, and I am sure the best way not to do that is to abuse those who comply with the contract made with the Government by buying its obligations and then cashing them in the manner provided by law. Here is a man who holds a liberty bond, and if he needs the money and his condition is such that he feels justified in doing so he has as much right to sell that bond as any other piece of property he honestly acquired. Any man or woman who has these war-savings stamps and who needs the money has a perfect legal right to cash them at the window as the Government contracted they should be cashed.

Mr. Chairman, the war is over, and the Government of the United States, instead of complaining about the payment of its honest obligations, should quit spending so infernally much money through its Congress and through its Treasury. If a man owes me money and I see him spending lavishly, the first impulse to me is that he should pay me his honest debts before he gives the money away or spends it with a lavish hand. Just the other day you donated here in the House $100,000,000 to charity. The Postmaster General says that we are about to buy the telegraphs and the telephones. Mr. McAdoo says we should buy $20,000,000,000 worth of railways and some other man says we should build houses in Washington so that every Government job holder may have a house to live in. A Government which is thus magnificently equipped with power to buy everything and answer every call of charity ought to be able at least to stand up and pay its obligations over the counter to the American people who need their money. [Applause.] I am tired of hearing these little political satraps denounce honest men and women who cash the obligations of the United States Government. I do not know what their particular situation may be. They may need the money and need it badly. If the Government needs the money, let us quit spending with such a lavish hand, let us demobilize the Army and bring our soldier heroes back from Russia and France, and let us demobilize those here at home, many of whom are acting as chauffeurs to little gentlemen who wear spurs and shoulder straps. Mr. Chairman, let us economize and devote the revenues of the Government to the operation of the Government's legitimate functions, and then we will not have to be abusing everybody who walks up to Uncle Sam and says, "You owe me $100 and I want my money." [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I second the sentiments suggested by my friend from Texas [Mr. DIES]. I fully agree with what he says.

However, that issue is not what I arose to speak upon. I want the attention of the members of the committee this afternoon to a resolution which I introduced to-day looking to the establishment in France of a proposed field of honor. This suggestion has come through a good number of public-spirited men, many of whose names appear on the resolution, some of whom came here to Washington and secured an interview with Secretary of War Baker, and his approval of the purpose they had in mind. Mr. Bailey, of Harrisburg, Mr. Eyre, of Philadelphia, and Mr. Cushman, of New York, were here together and had an interview with the War Department. The result of the interest created by these men was the bill introduced on the 14th of January by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], and which bill is now before the Committee on Military Affairs. The resolution I propose is supplemental to the War Department bill. The suggestion came from the Secretary of War that he would be glad to have an association formed for the embellishment of the proposed field. I called up the War Department this morning to get certain figures. I desired to know the number of soldiers who had made the supreme sacrifice in a foreign country. I am told that in action there were 30,000 soldiers killed, speaking in round numbers. Those who died from wounds and other causes number approximately 30,000 more. At least 3,000 others have been reported since the official statements were put out as having died, making something like 63,000 soldiers who will either rest in this country or in a foreign land. These soldiers fought in Belgium, France, Italy, and Russia. They were brigaded, according to the War Department information given to me this morning, from the northern boundary of Belgium to the Swiss boundary, making a stretch of line probably 200 miles in length. They were buried where they fell and their graves are marked with wooden slabs having on them the names of the soldiers. About the neck of the soldier is tied an aluminum tag upon which is his name and the section of the Army in which he fought so that they may be identified. The graves are not now guarded, according to the statement from the department this morning. The policy of the Government is to return these dead if possible. The difficulty in that, as will appear to all of you, is quite apparent. The Government, of course, will do this if it is possible to do it, but because of the scattered condition of these heroic dead and the care which I fear after the glamour of war is over will be dissipated, it appears to be a rational suggestion that we establish in France somewhere not a cemetery but, to get away from that idea, a field of honor, to be beautifully embellished and to be a thing of beauty for all time to come. The idea is not to put it on the battle field but to get from France one of her most beautiful chateaus, of 500 acres or more, in line with what France has already done for Britain.

I have understood that France has given in fee thousands of acres of her soil to Britain to be a resting place for the British sons that will not be taken back to Britain. The idea here is to find in the most beautiful part of France the most beautiful section from the standpoint of topography, a location near a city or a town that would be able to care for the population that might incidentally drift toward this place, as American travelers who would want to go where the heroic dead will abide, and also to make the field the last thing in beauty that an artist can make it, to be developed under the approval of the Association of Fine Arts here in Washington. The idea is to build within the field either one monumental building, to be a hall of records and a chapel, or to erect two buildings, one a hall of records and the other a chapel. This structure, of course, is to be also the last thing in architecture, so as to satisfy the demands of the highest standards of art—nothing inexpensive or commonplace. The field is not to be in the form of a cemetery, with a lot of tombstones, which, as a rule, never respect the sense of artistic taste, but to be laid out with reference to divisions represented in the battles in which the boys died—I mean divisions in the military sense. This would be better than if laid out in accordance with State lines. At the head of the divisions there is not to be a monument nor an inconsequential marker, but a column or an altar that would not be suggestive of any particular religious denomination, but such as could not from any angle offend anyone, and upon that altar to have the name of the division. The graves will be marked by a little headstone, with simply the name or the initial of the soldier upon the headstone.

The hall of records is to be the place where the records of all the boys will be preserved—the place and time of their birth, their enlistment, the division in which they served, where they fought, how they fell—and if there is anything especially out of the ordinary that would mark his life, that event is to be entered, so that anyone desiring to know what this soldier did or to know his history in France can go to this hall and there find a complete record of his service. Such a record will be made of all the boys who rest within the field. Then there will be a chart giving not only the field of honor in full detail, so a traveler at a glance can locate any division, but also charts to indicate the battle fields in which our soldiers were prominent, and it might be well to have mural drawings, not paintings, but charts of battle fields, so that anyone going within the hall could easily read not only the heroism of individuals but get at a glimpse what the battle fields of Europe were. Of course, fellow Members, there would be no effort to prevent any body from being brought back, where the parents or friends wanted the body brought. I do not think Congress would agree to anything of that sort; but I know, if the parent could realize that his loved one was sleeping in the most beautiful place in France, cared for by the Government, which would never allow it to be neglected, a place which will be perpetual, such parent would prefer that his loved one rest there, especially to having the body somewhere yonder in a great battle ground, unidentified and probably entirely lost sight of in time.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The gentleman's proposition appeals to me. Has the gentleman introduced a bill on this subject?

Mr. FESS. I have. There was a bill introduced on the 14th of January by Mr. DENT, and I have introduced a resolution to authorize the incorporation of a society to carry out the plan of embellishing this field from the artistic standpoint.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. Is it the purpose to keep a record on this field of honor of those soldiers only whose bodies are left in France?

Mr. FESS. No. It will not be limited to those.

Mr. HUSTED. Or of all the soldiers who have died in France?

Mr. FESS. I am very glad my friend introduces that question, because the idea is that all the soldiers who lost their lives on land or sea, whether the bodies may have been buried at sea or on land, all will be represented in this hall of records.

Mr. HUSTED. It seems to me that is quite right, but I inferred from something the gentleman said that only the soldiers whose bodies were left in France would have this permanent record.

Mr. FESS. No; perhaps my friends could infer that from what I said, but I did not mean that.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. JONES. I would like to know if the gentleman does not think it would be preferable to have a field of honor established in this country, and does not the gentleman think it would be just about as easy to bring them back here as to convey them to the point where the field is created?

Mr. FESS. I am not committing a breach of confidence when I say it is going to be a very difficult thing to bring the bodies back here. However, I do not want to inject that, because the War Department is going to do that to the very limit of its ability.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I beg pardon, I am afraid I will not have time. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAZARO. Has the gentleman given any thought to those who lost their lives in this country, so that there will not be any line of demarcation between those who lost their lives over there and those who lost their lives here?

Mr. FESS. No; I had not given any thought to that.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman understands there are thousands and thousands of boys who went into the service anxious to get over there, but who could not get over there, and who lost their lives in this country. Without taking anything away from those who lost their lives abroad, does not the gentleman think something should be done for those who lost their lives here if we are going into anything of the kind?

Mr. FESS. I admit the force of what my friend says in that connection. My purpose is to get the Congress to meet the situation——

Mr. LAZARO. Yes; I understand.

Mr. FESS. Of those who died in France; but, if gentlemen will permit me to proceed, I want to say this: The purpose of this association was not to put an expenditure upon the Government; that they would proceed to create a fund, perhaps of $15,000,000, to be administered under the authority of the Government, and thus make a permanent endowment, so that there would never be any doubt about the field becoming neglected. This could be raised in various ways, either by membership or by sale of a field-of-honor button, which would not entail any hardship upon anyone; and in order to avoid its being placed as any particular burden on the Government, in the way of an appropriation, the association would like to have that privilege to participate. Then, there is another thing I want to inject at this point.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. ROGERS. Is the gentleman committed to the exact name, "field of honor"? That, to me, has rather an unfortunate connotation of duelling days, and I wondered if the "field of glory" would not be preferable for that reason?

Mr. FESS. I had not thought of the connotation that is suggested. I hardly believe that we are near enough to the duelling days for us to retain that significance. I do not think that I would feel free to accept the word "glory" in preference to "honor," although what the gentleman says may have some significance. I meant to say that in addition to the association making an effort to gather funds, so as to make it perpetual, the Government would insist, of course, on being the final judge as to where the field should be located, which is to be by the permission and consent of the French Government; and, secondly, that the Government, of course, would be required to remove the bodies and place them within the field under the authority of the Government; and, thirdly, the Government would keep a guard of one or more companies of soldiers there permanently—not the same soldiers to remain there, but there is to be such a guard permanently maintained which is to be a symbol of the Government's perpetual presence upon the field.

The grounds should be so consecrated as to be open to Jew and Gentile, Protestant and Catholic, in keeping with the beautiful service which saw all fighting and dying side by side with no thought of religious differences; so may they sleep.

I hope the membership of the House will look into this proposal with a sympathetic viewpoint, because I am sure that the Government, while it will do what it can to bring home the remains of all our soldier dead, is going to have considerable difficulty in bringing the bodies back. And I am afraid that we will get into the position of leaving these bodies wherever they might now be resting, scattered all over that front, from Belgium to the Swiss border. And in time, no matter how beautiful is the devotion to-day of the French people to our soldier dead over there, you know it will be neglected; and I should like to have this thing done now, so that there will be no doubt that this field of honor will be a perpetual thing of beauty and a source of constant unity between our country and the allied countries for whose liberties they suffered and died.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. I am very much pleased to hear the gentleman's admirable suggestion. The intention is to assemble those that remain in Europe?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Has the gentleman reasoned it out quite thoroughly in his mind that it would be better for a corporation to get together the funds than to have the Government do it? Has that been pretty carefully considered?

Mr. FESS. The idea has been that this association, incorporated by the authority of this body, could proceed to gather the funds that must be expended under the direction of the Government.

Mr. LITTLE. It is quite possible that is correct; but I wondered if you had carefully considered as yet whether that would be better than to have the Government expend it?

Mr. FESS. I think it would be better, and I am going to frankly state here that I am afraid if the Government does it alone we will have but little more than a military cemetery, which will destroy much of the spirit of the purpose of this association. [Applause.]

No father or mother who knows his or her precious boy sleeps in a place of beauty under the care of this Government, which will never neglect the cause for which he died nor the grave in which he lies, will regret the inability of the Government to bring back the body. For this field of honor will be a perpetual reminder to all the world of the debt it owes to the service of the son who made the supreme sacrifice.

We all recall the beautiful tenderness of Col. Roosevelt's reply to the Government as to his wishes as to the disposition of the body of Quentin, when he expressed the wish of Mrs. Roosevelt and himself that the dead hero be allowed to rest in the field where he gave his life.

The resolution to carry out the purpose is as follows:

A bill to incorporate the American Field of Honor Association.

Be it enacted, etc., That William E. Bailey, of Pennsylvania; Wilson Eyre, of Pennsylvania; James S. Cushman, of New York; Hon. William Howard Taft, of Washington, D. C.; Dr. John H. Finley, of New York; Bishop Luther B. Wilson, of New York; Alfred E. Marling, of New York; Arthur Curtiss James, of New York; Henry Morgenthau, of New York; James H. Schiff, of New York; Hon. Morgan J. O'Brien, of New York; William Fellowes Morgan, of New York; Dr. William T. Manning, of New York; Cleveland H. Dodge, of New York; Commander Evangeline Booth, of New York; George Wharton Pepper, of Pennsylvania; William Potter, of Pennsylvania; Charles L. Borie, of Pennsylvania; Judge J. Willis Martin, of Pennsylvania; Owen Wister, of Pennsylvania; A. J. D. Dixon, of Pennsylvania; Col. Frederick M. Alger, of Michigan; Dr. George S. Stewart, of New York; Maj. Robert Davis, of New York; Mrs. Robert E. Speer, of New Jersey; Mrs. John Meigs, of Pennsylvania; Violet Oakley, of Pennsylvania; Agnes Repplier, of Pennsylvania; Mrs. Finley J. Shepard, of New York; and their associates and successors duly chosen, be, and they are hereby, incorporated, constituted, and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia by the name of The American Field of Honor Association.

SEC. 2. That the purposes of this association are and shall be: To cooperate with the Government in the selection and beautifying of a suitable and impressive estate in France for the creation of the American Field of Honor and its preservation as the final resting place of those who have made the supreme sacrifice in the cause of freedom and humanity, and to erect thereon such a building as shall serve, in the greatness of its intention and design, as a unified and single monument to the whole Nation and as a perpetual bond of union between America and the nations with whom we have been associated in the world's war.

SEC. 3. That the American Field of Honor Association shall consist of the people of every State in the Union who desire to express through their membership in it their appreciation of the sacrifice made by the Nation's immortal dead and their desire to unite in making that field of honor the country's great and living monument to America.

SEC. 4. That the American Field of Honor Association shall hold an annual meeting at such place in the United States as may be designated and shall make an annual report to Congress, to be filed with the Librarian of Congress, and shall submit before their adoption to the Commission of Fine Arts for any suggestions or for its approval all plans for the necessary monument of the proposed field of honor.

SEC. 5. That the American Field of Honor Association be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to receive by devise, bequest, donation, or otherwise, either real or personal property, and to use the same or to hold the same absolutely or in trust and to invest, reinvest, manage, and apply the same property and the income arising therefrom in furtherance of the objects and the spirit of its creation.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH].

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH] yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I do.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman from Minnesota need some more time?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I would like 10 minutes more.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes; and if I find I can spare another five minutes, I will be very glad to yield him that additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 15 minutes, 10 minutes yielded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] and 5 by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I almost hesitate to talk of Indian affairs under general debate as it is now progressing, for it seems almost as though extraneous matters were being brought into it. And I sometimes think that it is strange in this day and age, with the conditions in the world pertaining to and insuring democracy on this side and on the other side of the seas, that with more than a quarter of a million of our own people, the original possessors of this country, that in the general debate on Indian affairs in the House there seems to be but very few even of the members of the committee themselves who have anything to say to the Members of Congress upon that subject.

Now, I do not feel that I can enlighten any Members of the House upon Indian affairs. I do not feel that I can straighten out any of the jargon which has grown up through a bureaucratic control of the affairs of the red men of this country, but I do want at this time to say something along the general trend of Indian affairs and their condition.

A hundred years ago five of the tribes, known as the Five Civilized Tribes, had a government as we have a Government. They had their governors, their attorneys general, or those corresponding to attorneys general, secretaries of state, and legislative bodies. They made their laws; they had their judicial, executive, and legislative branches. They were civilized and have always been civilized, and what I say about Indians, by reason of the peculiar civilization existing then, an advanced civilization, and which has been maintained since, will not apply generally to these particular wealthy tribes in Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I will.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I just wanted to call the attention of the House to the further fact that during this period of tribal government it was developed among the Five Civilized Tribes by themselves mostly, with their own teachers and with the system of public schools by which not only tuition was furnished to the pupils of the Five Civilized Tribes, but also board and, in many instances, clothes. So that those people have really had a greater chance to become civilized in the last 100 years than has the white man himself. [Applause.]

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, and I feel grateful for a double reason, that secondarily——

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman who is speaking, or the gentleman who has taken his seat, whether that education was an education developed by the Five Civilized Tribes in their special civilization, or was it copied after the system of the ruling people of this country?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It was copied after the system of the white man, and the textbooks were in the English language, and the teaching was in the English language.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. And from information obtained by an inquisitorial commission in that part of the country a few years ago it may be well to say that there are some things in which the white man might imitate the example of the Indians in that particular community.

I want to turn to another matter. Those civilized tribes were taken by this Government and given what is known as the Indian Territory country to furnish a great buffer against the uncivilization of the Southwest. To-day we have a different system of what I might call bufferism, a new buffer; a buffer and a barrier between Government and an impending and threatening civilized condition of the aborigines; a buffer built upon the supposed incompetency of the Indians, upon the supposed assurance of educational facilities to be provided, and in which not the Indian's poverty but the Indian's wealth stands between him and advancement and progress.

In 1854 the Red Lake Band of Indians in the northern part of Minnesota and through North Dakota journeyed once a year to Fond du Lac, at the head of Lake Superior, where they were met by Indian agents, who doled out their annuities, consisting of $1 each. Each year they met, sometimes two or three weeks or a month before the time of the payment of their annuities, and when the time came for payment of their annuities by the agent they were in many cases in distress and in a condition of famine. That condition continued for 20 years, and during the time that those members of the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota expected and looked forward to a pittance to be doled out not one single member of the tribe ever became a self-supporting citizen or a self-supporting Indian.

In 1874 that system ceased, and in that year, when there was no expectancy whatever of any further pittances being paid by the Government to this Red Lake Band of the Chippewa Tribe—from that time until 1889, when the Government stepped in and made another treaty, and the Indians ceded nine or ten million acres of land under a treaty providing that the proceeds from the sale of certain lands reserved would be placed in trust for them and the lands sold for their benefit—for the 15 years between 1874 and 1889, without any expectation at all of help from the Government, the Indians of that band became self-respecting citizens, were absorbed in the general population, and were among the men most sought after as employees on the farms and in the towns and villages and in the several communities in which they lived.

In 1889, after that treaty was made—and I regret I have not time to go into it now——

Mr. GILLETT. Did they give up their tribal life? The gentleman said they mixed with others.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. They gave up their tribal life, but they did not give up their tribal relations in most instances. In many instances they mixed, a large portion of them, with the white population in the towns and villages and on the farms, and carried on occupations such as other men did in the same communities.

Now the bureaucratic control has been restored. There has been a large fund—speaking of the same band and the same tribe of Indians. I want just to give you a bird's-eye view of some of the top-heavy administrative expenses and administrative effort and energy that are being expended by the Government in proportion to the amount of benefit, the ultimate benefit, to the Indian himself. I want to read you what seems to be an important State document. I read:

Check No. 488. Authority sec. 3/20–18. Account 3110.
Red Lake Indian Agency, Red Lake, Minn., Mar. 28, 1918.
The First National Bank (79–1). Pay to the order of Joseph Green, $——— ——— ——— dollars.
Not negotiable until countersigned by United States disbursing agent.
Name ———, occupation ———, post-office address ———.
JOSEPH GREEN.
Name ———, occupation ———.
Signature or thumb mark of Indian depositor.
Father.
For to bal. a/c.
INDIVIDUAL INDIAN MONEY.
Approved for $———.
WALTER F. DICAM,
United States Disbursing Officer.

On the reverse side of this document I read the following:

If payee is unable to write, his indorsement must be a clear, distinct impression of his right thumb (or of left in case of loss of right) after his name. Indorsement to be witnessed by two reputable persons who can write; their names to be followed by addresses and occupations. Whenever possible one of the witnesses must be an employee of the Government or a member of the Indian's tribe.

Now, first, Joseph Green had to ascertain whether any member of the tribe could read or write. He might hire a horse and carriage and go out and find a man who could read, and if he did find such a man and he had a right thumb, he had to make the impression of his right thumb, or if he had no right thumb he would have to make his impression of his left thumb. [Laughter.] When he finally came to the Indian agent with the document properly marked he received the amount.

When I saw this check I said to the member of the tribe who showed it to me, "I do not want to talk about that, because it would be preposterous." He said, "Why?" I said, "It does not represent anything in particular." He said, "It represents exactly what is being done with the Indians." I have seen many checks during the year in which the amount did not exceed this—dozens and dozens of them. The amount of this check in which Joseph Green became the beneficiary of the United States through this great bureau was 11 cents. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. What would happen to Joseph Green if he had lost both right and left thumbs?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. If he was not suffering from ptomaine poisoning, he might possibly make his toe mark. [Laughter.]

Now, I want to proceed rapidly, in order to get through, although the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is going to give me another five minutes. A year ago, when this bill was under discussion in this House, some of our leading members on the Committee on Indian Affairs, including the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], said something about a man who knows more about Indian affairs than anybody else ever connected with Indian affairs still living, and possibly including all those who have gone to the beyond. Mr. NORTON says, speaking of James McLaughlin, a special inspector of the Government in the Interior Department but directly under the Indian Bureau, drawing a salary of $2,500 a year:

The most valuable man in the Indian Service in inspection work to-day is, in my judgment, unquestionably Maj. James McLaughlin, a man who has been in the Indian Service for nearly 40 years; a man who has made more treaties for the Government with Indians than any other living man; a man who has done more for the Indians of the United States and who is better acquainted with Indian affairs than any other man living in this country to-day.

* * * * * * *

To-day he is the most beloved and the most respected man among the Indians in North and South Dakota. His record in the service of the Government is one of which any man could feel justly proud. It is one the emulation of which by others in the Indian Service will bring about much-needed improvement in the administration of Indian affairs. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma then said:

I heartily concur in every word that has been said by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

A Member just asked me how long Maj. McLaughlin had been on the pay roll. He was on the pay roll perhaps before some Members here now were born, and during all the time I doubt not he was drawing less salary than he might have been able to draw had he been employed in a different capacity. He is one of the men in the Government service with a capacity of from $6,000 to $10,000 a year who has continued working, year after year, for $2,500, and prior to a few years ago for even less than that. There has never been a man in the Indian Service, so far as I am advised, who has rendered more beneficial service, both for the Federal Government and for the Indians, than has Maj. McLaughlin.

* * * * * * *

Maj. McLaughlin has ever been the friend of the Indians, he has ever had the confidence of the Indians. It is worth while for any Member of this House to spend a few evenings reading that very valuable book written by Maj. McLaughlin entitled, "My Friend the Indian."

All praise to Maj. McLaughlin, all honor to this noble, courageous, intelligent, diligent Government inspector, against whose long and valuable public service the tongue of slander has never wagged and who never faltered in the performance of a duty. [Applause.]

Then Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas says:

Mr. Chairman, I count among my best friends in the public service Maj. McLaughlin, the friend of the Indian. [Applause.]

Then he said:

I got my liking for the Indian and my interest in his behalf through association with Maj. McLaughlin. I have read his book, "My Friend the Indian." It is one of the most illuminating works upon the American Indian that has ever been published. It was written by a man who loves the Indians, who has lived with them, and who has worked with and for them. For more than 40 years Maj. McLaughlin's life has been interlocked with the life of the American Indian. Years ago, when uprisings were imminent in any Indian tribe, Maj. McLaughlin, with that courage that his name would indicate, would go to the tribe, would sit with them in their councils, talk with them in their own language, and he has secured many treaties from unfriendly Indians who were about to go upon the warpath which have resulted in the maintenance of peace. He has rendered great service to the Indian and to the United States in the years of his connection with the Indians and with the Interior Department. Maj. McLaughlin is about 76 years young. I do not know where he is now. Perhaps he is out in the Dakotas or in Wyoming. He is somewhere rendering service to the United States and to the Indians. He works like a steam engine. I have known few men who have his capacity for work. At his age he seems never to tire, and he has the faculty of going right to the gist of a question. A few years ago, when a most intricate and important matter was under consideration, Maj. McLaughlin was selected by the Secretary of the Interior and commissioned especially to make an investigation of the entire subject, and the report made by him in that matter is the last word upon the subject. He has always rendered that kind of service to the Government and to the Indians, and I would like to join with my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber in doing something besides merely giving him words of praise. This House can well afford to spend a few moments in giving recognition to the splendid services that Maj. McLaughlin has rendered. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I thank the gentleman. I would like to stop to add my tribute to Maj. McLaughlin, but I shall proceed now to say something of his opinions as recorded in his book written and published in the last few years. I am sure since I have been here there has been nothing in the RECORD of what this man—perhaps the most prominent of all in or out of the service, dead or alive—thinks about the Indian problem to-day. I read from the twenty-first chapter of his book, "My Friend the Indian," dedicated in his own words "To my friend the Indian, whose good traits survive as a monument over the graves of a vanishing race." The last chapter is entitled "Give the Red Man His Portion." I have made extracts from it and shall proceed, without comment, to read them, trusting that you will fill in the interlocking spaces between with a subject supply of what the comment relates to. This book was written in 1910, so that it is not an ancient work.

Speaking of tribal funds—

The fund as it stands might be described as an endowment for the creation of paupers and the perpetuation of the present state of dependence among the people to whose credit it stands. * * * And, resting as he does under the weight of this burden of wealth, getting enough of it from time to time to keep the life in his body and prevent him from exerting himself to any great extent on his own behalf, the American Indian is fated to die in a state of unthrift and indigence, a sort of half breed ward in chancery. It appears to me that it is the duty of the Government to make some provision presently for the emancipation of these unhappy victims, to deliver them from the evils that guarantee a future of ungentle paupery, by giving to the Indian his portion and turning him adrift to work out his own salvation.

The Indian and his condition is not so important a matter to the majority of the people of the United States as the smashing of the trusts and the reformation of the "system," but no question that affects the moral and physical salvation of over a quarter of a million human beings living in this country can be lacking in importance to the rest of the people, and this problem, in which is involved the future of the Indian and the disposition of the wealth that a paternal Government has sequestered for his benefit, is of imminent and practical interest to the people of the West in particular and to all the people of the country in general. Moreover, the Indian problem is involved in a condition created by and for the benefit of the American people. Leaning as he does on a governmental prop that is unstable, the Indian to-day calmly asks, "What are you going to do about it?" And the question must be answered not by the bookman, nor by the missionary societies, but by the practical men who are to-day engaged in giving to the administration of governmental affairs the best thought and the most practical intelligence ever placed at the disposal of the people of the Republic. He might be cowed by a show of military pomp, then fighting him in force and subduing him to the point of making him glad to accept a treaty. The treaty being made, white men broke it. The white men broke all the treaties. Gen. Sherman, who did not love the Indian overmuch, declared that all the Indian wars were chargeable to the white men and their bad faith. Other men—not the faddists who exploit the Indian for advertising purposes—agreed with Sherman, and I know nothing to support a contention that the Indian was treacherous and capable of breaking faith when he had made a fair engagement.

And then he says, speaking of the Indians of South Dakota as typical of all:

This body of Indians might be taken as fairly showing the result of the policy of holding the Indian in wardship and making him heir to wealth that is being gradually distributed.

And I have no hesitancy in saying that the condition of these Indians to-day is not as hopeful as it was 18 years ago, when they had no wealth in expectancy and no payments to depend on. Their advancement has been greatly retarded by the system under which they live. They lack the manly qualities that distinguished them generally 15 or 20 years ago; they have no self-dependence; they lean on the Government or the agent in all their affairs; they are in debt. They squander the money that is given them—I am speaking of the people generally, for there are a few notable exceptions to this rule. The younger people have little pride of ancestry and no care for the future. The older people have neither ambition nor hope—beyond the next payment. They are utterly listless of the passing of time, except as it brings a payment nearer, and are much given to the cheaper amusements of the whites and the inane dances of their ancestors. Fifteen years of annuity drawing has made a people that was struggling to the surface by personal effort a set of paupers in chancery. * * * They would be better off, so far as the future is concerned, if they stood as blanketed Indians on the virgin prairie. They prove incontrovertibly the demoralizing effect of the present system, and they stand as a fair sample of people treated as they have been.

Fortunately not all of the Indians have money in the Treasury upon which to draw. I say "fortunately," for the Indian who has nothing at all, either at present or in expectancy, is much better off than these, and infinitely better material upon which to work. * * * As a matter of fact, the Indians of the trans-Missouri reservations, who have practically no income save that which is produced by leasing their lands for grazing purposes or what they earn by labor, are infinitely better off than these civilized and wealthy cousins of theirs. The Teton Sioux is better physically and morally and of stronger mentality than the annuitant. He has been compelled to exert himself since he was driven out of his hunting grounds, and he has had rather better health than some of his compeers for that reason. He has passed through the transitory stage involved in the change of his manner of life, and he is recovering from the anemic condition to which he was reduced by the change from the tepee to the log house, from fresh meat to cereal goods. For seven years he has had no Government assistance, except for the maintenance of schools and rations for the aged and indigent, and he is now taking his land in severalty. The demoralization will come if the present system obtains.

I would not argue that the economic and social condition of the Indian is satisfactory in the inverse ratio to his wealth; but it appears certain to me that the Indian who attained to the right to draw a dole from the Government before he had developed up to the state of being able to get a living for himself is laboring under a serious handicap and is at a standstill or retrograding.

In another chapter of this same book he says that while we are very slow to violate treaty provisions, so far as keeping the funds is concerned, and not giving the funds to the Indians per capita until the treaties expire, we are not at all squeamish about violating the treaties in any other respects so long as it increases the control of the bureau and perhaps gives still further opportunity of keeping the money from the Indians.

These immense holdings are being doled out to the Indians by a pauperizing system in sums inadequate to their needs yet sufficient to give the annuitants the sense of being provided for. I am not sure but that the average white man, if assured of a sufficient income to scratch along on, would not proceed to become an Indian after his fashion. * * *

This is the problem that confronts the white man: How is the Indian to be saved from himself and his riches?

To me the question admits of but one answer. Give the people the money they have coming; give it to them as soon as possible. So soon as the proper official declares that an Indian is competent to administer his own affairs let that Indian have his portion of the funds, also a patent in fee for his allotment, and let him shift for himself. This procedure would relieve the Government of the care of these funds and build up manhood and individual self-reliance, which can never be realized under the present doling-out process. Do away with the leading strings and checkreins by which the Indian is now handicapped and he will immediately feel the necessity for demonstrating his capacity to manage his own estate. By this means only can the Indian be saved from chronic indigence and ultimate and absolute paupery; and I am sufficiently well acquainted with Indian nature to venture the prophecy that a large majority of those under 50 years of age will develop the capacity to hustle for themselves exactly in the proportion that their needs press them. Take away his annuity by letting him handle the principal and the Indian will be given a start on the road to complete civilization and independence that will land him at the desired goal.

I want to say, in closing, that if the Government should decide to-morrow, regardless of the competency or incompetency of the individual members of the Indian tribes, to give to every single one of them in this country the money or property to which he is entitled, held in trust funds or of tribal funds or allotments, or whatever it may be, there could not and would not in one case out of a hundred be a single instance where the money would be squandered by reason of the fact that the control of the Indian Bureau had been taken away and the restriction removed; or, if it were squandered, the "squanderer," if I may use the term, would then turn his hand to some useful occupation, because the "civilizing" influence of the Government would cease to hamper him.

I say this because I believe that the courts of this land are just as much to be depended upon to protect incompetent persons to handle their own affairs as the Indian Bureau, and because I do not believe that there is a single reason to doubt that every court in the country would give them the same protection as to their allotments and their tribal funds as they would give to any other incompetent persons. They would get the same consideration if they were not competent and not frugal in any State of the Union.

The foundation on which this bureaucratic government is maintained is this: It is a sort of a tripod arrangement. You have the educational proposition, you have the incompetent proposition, and you have the Indian's wealth. These are the three things that stand between the Indian and the Indian's freedom and the right of holding his own property at the present time. But just as soon as you get an item of expense, whether it be a gratuity or payment, and especially if it be taken from the tribal fund, you run against this proposition, that a part of that money is spent for schools. I make the assertion that if you close every school—and I will except Oklahoma only, because they have their own government, they attend to their own business; the Five Tribes of Oklahoma are like a great corporation, they take care of themselves—if you exclude them and close every school, both day and boarding schools, in the next year, you could start out in very many localities without serious concern as to Indian children not being able to secure an education in the public schools and colleges in the States in which they live. There is no question about that in my mind; but when it comes to a show-down the proposition which affects the cutting out from the Indian bill of an appropriation made you run amuck every time of some one somewhere who draws a salary from some particular fund that may overlap an expenditure for schools. The expenditure may be so remote that it only gets into the schools through a third, fourth, or fifth step arrangement whereby somebody draws a salary as an inspector or supervisor of an Indian school in that vicinity or thereabouts. [Applause.] I should favor a commencement now, in this Congress, in this bill, on a new plan of cutting down items which are top-heavy with administration expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, before I begin the discussion of the question that I intend to discuss briefly this morning I want to say, in reply to the speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], that I am in favor of returning the bodies of American soldiers to America. I think that the Government that is able to take a boy from home when in the vigor of life to go to the place of danger, wherever it may be, and there spill his blood and die for the flag, that that Government ought to bring the remains of that boy back home. [Applause.] I think that those who bade these boys good-by, who went away with their blessings upon them, ought now to be permitted to have their remains returned, wrapped in the flag of our country. [Applause.] Now, I know that a great international cemetery in France would cause thousands and hundreds of thousands of American tourists to go there. Many of our people would want to go there and lay a flower on the graves of their loved ones. That is true, but, gentlemen, you know that thousands of boys went out from our country whose parents are not able to make that journey across the sea. Are they to be deprived of ever standing at the grave side of the one who in the flower of his young manhood died for his country and for civilization? [Applause.]

I am in favor of bringing back the remains of these boys who fell in battle or died with disease upon foreign fields. I think it is a measly contention that this the greatest Government on the globe, the richest Republic on the earth, should now undertake to save its money by allowing these boys' bodies to remain on a foreign battle field when their loved ones want them brought home. [Applause.] I would leave that to the American father and mother, those who brought them into being and who nurtured them to manhood. I would allow them to say whether they wanted them to remain there, and if they did I would permit the boy to sleep where he is buried, if his parents want him to remain there, as was the wish of Col. Roosevelt with regard to his brave boy who died in battle; but if they want the body brought home, it should be done. In the absence of any statement from them on the subject, then I would provide a great national burying ground in the United States and let them sleep in the soil of the land of their birth. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about the cotton industry of the United States. This industry is of vital interest to thirty-odd millions of American people. In 1914 we exported 9,501,000 bales of American cotton. That was the last year before the war.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I quite agree with the gentleman's position about bringing the bodies home or leaving it to the parents. But as I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] his plan is that the field of honor shall be for those whose parents do not care to have them brought back home.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not so understand it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, that was the situation. No one has refused to have the bodies brought back home.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then I did not understand the gentleman's position. I did not hear all of his speech.

I was speaking of cotton. In 1914, the last year before the war, American cotton had become so popular and so necessary to the people of the Old World that they demanded of us that year nine and a half million bales of American cotton. That year the American mills consumed a little over 5,000,000 bales. Last year the American mills consumed 7,500,000 bales. Of course, the spinning industry of the Old World was disturbed during the war. People were compelled to wear old clothes, and they have worn out their old clothes. The people of the Old World were compelled to plant their cotton acreage in foodstuffs, and they have made but very little cotton. In 1914 they had a fairly good cotton crop of the kind they produce, and in 1918 they have made no cotton of any consequence. In 1914 we made the biggest crop in our history. But in 1918 we have made one of the smallest crops in four years. There is a dearth of cotton the like of which I have not seen in my day. The world's cotton crop is nearly 7,000,000 bales short, and yet in spite of that, in spite of the cotton famine that confronts us, the New York Cotton Exchange under a bear raid drove down the price of cotton in one day last week $88,000,000 on an 11,000,000-bale crop. Something has got to be done to stop such wholesale destruction of values. I am in favor of protecting the wheat growers of America against a raid by speculators on the grain exchange, and I am in favor of living up to this Government's pledge to the wheat growers, but, gentlemen, you have got to help us protect the cotton industry against the destructive raids inaugurated by certain foreign and American spinners.

The spinner here and abroad has sold the cotton goods to be made out of this crop. The spinners here and abroad have sold it on a cost price to them ranging from 35 to 40 cents a pound, and upon that basis they will average a profit after every expense is counted of over $235 a bale. What reason is there in justice and fair dealing for beating down the price in such fashion? The consumer is not going to get the benefit of it. The producer is being robbed. Let me show you some figures: The spinning industry in the United States consumed 5,800,000 bales of the 1913 crop. In 1914 the manufactured products from that portion of the American crop brought $701,000,000. The American cotton crop of 1914—16,000,000 bales—sold for $141,000,000, less than one-third of the crop in the manufactured state brought in 1914. So you can see that without any reason the producer is being robbed by a bear conspiracy of certain American and foreign spinners. They broke the price of cotton futures from $25 to $30 a bale in two weeks. Cotton will go back to 30 cents a pound in 15 days. It is now around 23 or 24 cents a pound on the exchange. But the producers are not selling. The spots are 28 and 29 cents. The producer is refusing to sell. He is holding and will continue to hold until he can obtain a fair price. On yesterday bear speculators put out a report that the Federal reserve banks were going to call in their loans on cotton. This was done to stampede the market. The board here says that there is no truth in such a report. All of these things are indulged in to aid a group of cotton spinners in the United States as well as foreign spinners to beat these prices down, and to buy it as low as possible, get it out of the hands of the producer, and then speculate on the exchange and run it up to 40 cents a pound. You mark my prediction; you will see cotton futures 40 cents a pound on the exchange before July 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am pleading for a fair deal for the cotton producers of the United States. The cotton producer paid $250 and $300 each for your western mules to make this crop. He bought grain and meat from the western men, and we have gone to greater expense in making this crop than any crop we have ever produced. We have had to fight the boll weevil, the red spider; and the drought destroyed thousands of bales in Texas and other States. The demand is great and the supply is small, and yet following the war the price is beaten down and down.

Take the history of wool, take the history of flax, or silk and cotton, and always following a war, with no exception in human history, they have gone up in price. Wool has gone up. It is in great demand and it is very scarce. That makes the demand for cotton greater as a substitute for wool, because there is not enough wool to supply the demand, and cotton will. There is not enough cotton to supply the channels heretofore supplied by cotton. Let me give you an idea about the profit Great Britain makes upon her spinning industry. The Philadelphia North American said in 1912 that Great Britain paid

$401,000,000 for her raw cotton. She manufactured it, supplied all of the people of the United Kingdom, and then sold the surplus outside to other countries for $611,000,000. She received over $200,000,000 more for this remnant of the finished product than all of the raw material cost at the outset. That gives you an idea about the profit that the spinner makes. So the spinner can not be justified from any standpoint of justice and fairness for this bear raid upon the cotton exchange. I am simply pleading for justice to this great army of cotton producers in the United States. [Applause.] There must be something done, gentlemen, and done speedily. I am going to suggest a remedy very soon. Let me suggest here that we can raise $100,000 in revenue on the New York Cotton Exchange by turning over the classification and inspection fees to the Government. Let the Government receive the 25 and 50 cents a bale for inspection and classification. Then this inspection and classification will be unbiased, it will be as fair to the buyer as to the seller. We can probably raise $250,000 on the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges. These Government officials would give a fair deal to buyer and seller. The exchange ought to be forced to handle only spindle cotton, and it ought to be compelled to obey the law. The producers will hold between three and four million bales of this crop. Now, the effect of this tremendous break was that there was a loss in the price of futures of $30 a bale in two weeks. What do our producers say? Why, they say, "We can not afford to sell at the low price, and we will not." I have had letters from some of them saying that they do not intend to plant cotton this year; that they can make more money raising pigs and raising foodstuffs, because the boll weevil is there now and they would not have to take any chances with other crops. They will hold what cotton they have and wait for the good price which is bound to come. So the spinners who went into this conspiracy to rob the producer will pay for their folly before this thing is over.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I appreciate the gentleman's interest in cotton and am somewhat in sympathy with a large portion of it, but would not the producers of cotton now, as they did some months ago, rather resist the interference of the Government tending to stabilize or fix the price of this cotton?

Mr. HEFLIN. The reason the southern producer opposed fixing the price of cotton was because he feared that a reasonable price would not be fixed. You will recall that a gentleman here from Indiana introduced a bill to fix the price at 15 cents a pound, and I say to the gentleman from Nebraska that the passage of that bill would have bankrupted the whole South. It would have brought ruin to our producers. A gentleman from Ohio introduced a bill putting it at 20 cents a pound, and that figure would have bankrupted our people. Anything under 30 cents for this cotton crop would have ruined the producer and every financial interest connected with him. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask the gentleman for two more minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield the gentleman two more minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield for a question or a suggestion?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. RAGSDALE. When we fixed the price of wheat the Government sought to stabilize it and provided a market for wheat, and when the next wheat crop was about to come into sight there was not 10 days' supply of wheat in America. When the gentlemen in charge of fixing the price of cotton seed, which is two-thirds of the cotton production, the total weight of it, although they fixed the price of wheat and provided a market to the farmers, they found no market for cotton seed; and the fear was that the same regulation would do for the lint as it did for the seed, the fixation of a price without giving a market. It is very different from what it was in reference to the wheat question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not only that, but I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska that at the time the war came on they fixed the price of wheat at $2.20, and that was more than double the old price. Cotton sold for about 15 cents for five years prior to the war; doubling cotton at the same percentage as was on wheat would make cotton bring about 34 cents a pound.

Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. KNUTSON, and Mr. WELLING rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will yield to all three. I yield first to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman says the price was fixed when the war commenced. What does the gentleman mean—the European war or when we entered the war?

Mr. HEFLIN. At the beginning of the European war.

Mr. WELLING. At the time we entered the war wheat was more than $2.20.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given time to answer a question.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. KNUTSON. Am I correctly informed that when there was a movement on foot a year ago last summer to fix the price on cotton the commercial bodies of New Orleans, Atlanta, and different places sent a delegation here to protest to President Wilson against the fixing of such price?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true, because, as I said, one gentleman here, a Democrat from Indiana [Mr. Cox], offered a bill making the price 15 cents a pound, and another one, a Republican [Mr. EMERSON], offered a bill fixing the price at 20 cents a pound, which scared them almost to death. If the price had been fixed at around 30 cents a pound at that time, I do not think they would have objected, but as three-fourths of the country knew nothing about the cost of cotton production they were afraid that they would not be given a fair price for it.

Mr. KNUTSON. The President could have been depended upon to fix a fair price. What was a fair price on wheat?

Mr. HEFLIN. You all were pretty well satisfied with the treatment of wheat.

It cost more to produce this cotton crop than any previous crop. All we want, gentlemen, is the price that the law of supply and demand entitles us to. We made this crop expecting to get 30 cents and above, just as you people are expecting to get $2.20 for this crop of wheat this year. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman must remember that we got in before it commenced raining.

Mr. HEFLIN. I know you did.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am rising at this time in this general debate to call attention to a matter which has recently been brought to my notice and which I think is of such a nature that the country ought to know something about it. When we went into this war and passed certain acts giving control of the railroads of the country to the Government, it was done as an emergency measure only. We concluded that it might be necessary for the Government, in order to carry on this war properly, that it have control of the railroads of the country. It was not the intention, I dare say, of the majority of those who voted for the railroad-control act that it should be made the instrument by those who should execute it to lead the country toward the policy of Government ownership of these public utilities. And yet I believe that most of the orders that have emanated from the Railroad Administration since they have had charge of the railroads of this country have led as far as they could toward ultimate Government ownership. And it occurs to me that, in what I have seen of the majority party in this House, perhaps most of them incline to that view. Personally I do not, for many reasons. I think that so far as private ownership can obtain in this country of any institution—any public utility or anything else—that private ownership should continue to obtain. In other words, as I have said here before, I do not believe the Government ought to ever engage in private business unless it is necessary in the exercise of its police powers or to maintain the health, morals, or good order of the community. We have had very many peculiar and extraordinary orders issued by the Railroad and Food Administrations since this war began, but none, I dare say, gentlemen of the committee, more peculiar than this order I desire to call to your attention.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a brief interruption?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; though I have but 10 minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman how much of an investigation leads him to the conclusion that the majority on this side is in favor of Government ownership? My investigation leads to the reverse of that. I am guiltless, at least.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I know. I have heard the gentleman from Texas express himself and I admire his good judgment in that matter. I think, however, the position of the Democratic leaders on the committees has been sufficient to convince the membership that there is a strong sentiment, at least in the committees, on your side of the House in favor of that ultimate position.

I assume that the majority of you men represent, in part at least, districts where they ship grain to market, and therefore you are interested in this: This order is an order issued by the United States Railroad Administrator on November 26 last, called General Order No. 57, and which has to do with the filing and adjudication of claims for a loss of bulk grain in transit. The law in my State—and I assume it is the law in most of the States of this Union—is that when grain, or any other commodity, for that matter, is delivered to the common carrier that that is itself a delivery to the consignee. The legislature in our State, and, I assume, in most of your States, has passed laws providing that when grain in bulk has been consigned to some consignee, and has been delivered to the common carrier, it shall be weighed in on proper scales, to be furnished by the railroad, and that it shall be weighed out at the other end, and that any loss in transit shall be chargeable to the carrier and can be made the basis of a claim. This provision of the law in Illinois was incorporated in a part of section 118, in chapter 114, of our statutes. I will read it briefly, because I think it is the statute in most of the States:

At the time such grain—

That is, grain in bulk—is received by it for transportation—

That is, the common carrier—

such corporation shall carefully and correctly weigh the same and issue to the shipper thereof a receipt or bill of lading for such grain, in which shall be stated the true and correct weight.

Weighing out, shrinkage: And such corporation shall weigh out and deliver to such shipper, his consignee, or other person entitled to receive the same, at the place of delivery, the full amount of such grain, without any deduction for leakage, shrinkage, or other loss in the quantity of the same.

Damages: In default of such delivery, the corporation so failing to deliver the full amount of such grain shall pay to the person entitled thereto the full market value of any such grain not delivered at the time and place when and where the same should have been delivered.

Now, gentlemen, the object of that statute is plain and obvious to anyone who can read. The object of it is that when grain is delivered to a railroad company for transit the railroad company shall take reasonable care and shall deliver that to the consignee as it was shipped. If the rule obtained that the consignor must follow his grain or that the consignee must look after it in transit, it would be absolutely impossible for him to trace that shipment through various ramifications throughout the country and ascertain whether the grain was lost in transit by the negligence of the carrier or not. Notice the language of this peculiar order issued by the United States Railroad Administration. In the first place, it is stated by the administration:

Claims on grain shipped in bulk constitute a large proportion of loss and damage claims. Some of the widely varying practices of both shippers and carriers with respect thereto are of doubtful propriety, and in many cases result in undue preference and unjust discrimination.

* * * * * * *

In view of the foregoing, there is no good reason why carriers should assume responsibility for claims the basis of which is solely the difference between these loading and outturn weights.

Therefore claims for loss of bulk grain will be recognized only where there is evidence of negligence on the part of the carriers. Leaks due to improper coopering of cars or placing of grain-door boards are not to be considered as evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier, and the following rule shall apply until superseded by others that may be adopted as a result of investigation and study of the subject now being carried on by carriers and shippers in connection with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The true interpretation of that language is this: That claims for loss of grain will be recognized only when there is evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier. Do you see what that means, gentlemen? It means that the burden of proving loss of grain in transit is shifted from the common carrier to the consignor or consignee. It means that no claims for losses will be allowed at any time by the United States Railroad Administration unless there is absolute proof made by the consignor or consignee that the loss was due to the negligence of the carrier. Now, how many claims, gentlemen, do you suppose can be authenticated by that method of procedure?

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does not that order set aside the rule requiring the railroads to furnish suitable cars? Does not that ruling excuse them for failure to furnish suitable cars?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. I will come to that in a moment. Down in my country—and I expect it is true in the gentleman's country, and in many cases men ship from sidings—cars are furnished by the railroad carriers upon request. The shipper is lucky if he gets any kind of a car. The railroad company puts his car on the siding, and the shipper loads the grain in the car provided for him. If he should demand a better car he might not get one for a long time, and he might not get any at all. He might have to wait for months. So he takes the car that is furnished to him.

Now, when the railroad company furnishes him a poor car, it does not thereby decrease the freight rate, does it? The railroad companies get twice the freight rates they received before, almost. So the shipper loads the car, and when it gets to its destination it is found that there is a loss of weight in transit. But under this order the burden is upon the shipper to prove that that loss of weight is through the fault or negligence of the company.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. What is your practice out there about bills of lading? Have you restricted bills of lading or open?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They are usually restricted.

Mr. DEWALT. If you have a restricted bill of lading, how can you compel the Federal Railroad Administration to pay a loss? How can you compel them to pay a loss on a restricted bill of lading?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That comes under the provisions of the statute.

Mr. DEWALT. Would not a restricted bill of lading operate against your construction?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think the statute would govern. I understand that is practically the rule in every State in the Union, and I think it is true in the gentleman's State.

But, now, under this ruling, when the shipper, whether in Pennsylvania or in Illinois, starts a shipment of wheat to Chicago or to some other point, and it gets there and it is found to be short in weight, in order to get any damage somebody has to prove that it was the fault of the railroad company. How can you do it? The records are in their possession. They can trace the shipment. Sometimes the shipment has taken several weeks. In rule 8, in order to make the defense of the railroad company or common carrier better, observe the language. I read:

a. Clear-record cars. If, after thorough investigation by the carrier, no defect in equipment or seal record is discovered, such record will be considered to show that the carrier has delivered all of the grain that was loaded in the car—

No matter how much is there. If the railroad company's certificate says that they have made investigation and found no defect in the equipment or seal, it is equivalent to showing that the same amount of weight is in the car that was put in the car. Then, again—

If evidence is produced by the claimant indicating a defective record, such evidence shall be investigated and given due consideration.

In other words, the certificate of the common carrier is considered as prima facie evidence that they have done their duty and delivered all the grain, while the claimant's contention to the contrary will be given "due consideration." I insist that the order repeals by implication the laws of practically every State. It overturns the rules of damages of all our courts. It establishes a condition where no one who has a claim on shipments of grain can recover from the Government, and therefore this inures to the benefit of the common carriers, just like the other rules that have been made. I submit that this rule of the Railroad Administration ought to be immediately withdrawn; and, inasmuch as I have no voice that can be heard much anywhere else, I have made this statement here, so that it possibly can give to the country in some way the gist and purpose of this order as I understand it. I have not criticized the administration very much. I voted for the railroad administration legislation, and I voted for the food administration act and other acts in the emergency, and I did it to hold up the hands of the President and do everything I could to help in carrying on this war. But the time has come now when we are embarking on times of peace, and orders of this kind should not be rashly and inconsiderately entered by those who are administering the laws and issuing orders that will redound to the disadvantage of the people of the country.

When the railroad-administration act was passed, as I have said, it was the manifest purpose of Congress to give to the administration the control of the railroads of the country, so that shipment of troops, munitions, food supplies, and other necessary war materials might be coordinated and regulated and expedited. A similar measure was enacted during the Civil War, and as a result of that act President Lincoln took possession of something like 2,500 miles of railway in the United States, which were used for war purposes and immediately turned back to the private owners as soon as the war was ended by the surrender of the Confederate forces. The administration of the railroads of the country by the Government ought to be such as to unsettle existing rules and regulations and State and Federal laws as little as is absolutely possible. But instead of this the most revolutionary steps have been taken, until no one knows what his legal rights are as regards these public utilities in the way of ownership or legal action against them. Millions of dollars' worth of claims are now pending in the United States, proper and legitimate claims, in which the claimants have no surety that they may be ever able to collect any amounts from the railroads. The Railroad Administration orders have been continually in favor of the railroads and against the general public, and this order No. 57 is simply a continuance of the same discrimination against the public that has characterized the entire administration. Hardly had the administration begun its work before freight rates were suddenly increased almost 100 per cent, then passenger rates were practically doubled; train service was disorganized. The poorest train service that has ever been experienced by this country has been since the Railroad Administration took control of the railroads. The efficiency of the employees has been lessened and the service to the traveling public has been almost indefensible. The Railroad Administration, in its various orders, has absolutely nullified and abrogated the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and has been permitting consolidations and combinations that we have been trying for 25 years to prevent by legislation. An administration that went into power decrying the trusts and combinations has suddenly created the greatest trust and combination of railroad companies that any country ever saw, and is now insisting through the Railroad Administration on the continuance of this system. If what we have had is a fair example of Government ownership, then the sooner we have done with it the better.

Order No. 57 violates not only the statutes of the State of Illinois and many other States in the Union, but it violates the Federal law as well. It is in direct violation of the provisions of an act relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce approved August 29, 1916. As I have said, it abrogates and sets aside the established rules of the common law and statutory enactments generally. Every requirement of justice and of orderly procedure in such matters requires the immediate withdrawal of this pernicious order. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am authorized to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH] struck the keynote of the Indian situation when he said that they stand upon a tripod—education, incompetency, and finance.

But I want to say that if the Congress of the United States should adopt a policy that would take the money that belongs to these Indians out of the Treasury of the United States and start them upon a business career you would soon find that the interest of this bureau would diminish immediately. If you remove the financial proposition out of the Indian question you will see how soon the interest that is so manifest now as to the welfare of the Indians would disappear.

In Oklahoma, where many members of these Five Civilized Tribes are the equals of the white men that live among them in intelligence and thrift and business industry, I want to say to you that they are hamstrung by this Bureau of Indian Affairs. A man can not secure in that country the control of his own property. Although he invests thousands of dollars in liberty bonds, he is not permitted to have the interest that is collected from his liberty bonds. In probate matters in Oklahoma it is not sufficient for the probate judge selected by the intelligent citizenship of that State—in which the Indian citizen has equal opportunity with the white man to vote for the judge—it is not enough to have a probate judge set over them to look after their affairs and pass on their accounts. That is not sufficient to satisfy the Indian Bureau. Indian agents must be appointed to go all over their accounts, and although the county judges in the several counties shall approve the accounts of the guardian, yet he can not pay the money out until it has the O. K. of the department.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCKEOWN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman realizes that that would make more places in the departments here, so that that department is like the other departments in that respect.

Mr. MCKEOWN. This department is not the only one here that is overcrowded with employees. Nearly all of the departments with which I have had anything to do have a surplus of employees.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MCKEOWN. I want to call attention to the fact that when a guardian in the State of Oklahoma is appointed over a minor or incompetent Indian and gives a surety bond as good as can be given in the United States, he is not permitted to have the funds of his ward turned over to him and administered in the courts of Oklahoma, but he will get the funds if it meets the pleasure of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, no matter how good the security of the bond. I say to you that this double guardianship is an outrage and a reflection upon the intelligent citizenship of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read an editorial from the New York Times upon this question of Indians and their affairs:

[From the New York Times.]

INDIAN CITIZENSHIP.

A story of the heroism of two American Indians has been told in the dispatches from France. On a scouting expedition back of the German line they stealthily found their way to a building used as staff headquarters, where a group of officers were smoking and drinking at their ease, with no thought of danger. The Indians, one of whom was a lieutenant and the other a private, threw hand grenades into the room. All the Germans but one were killed or wounded. The survivor, running from the building was shot dead with a revolver by the Indian private. With his officer he reached the American trenches, but both were wounded by the fire of the aroused enemy. At an emergency hospital the Indian private was asked how he felt. "I am all right," he said, but fell as he spoke the words, and expired.

It was perhaps the impression of those who read the report of this daring achievement that the Indian was a rarity in the American Army. The fact is, however, that about 10,000 Indians have served in the Army and Navy, chiefly with the land forces. Most of them volunteered. Our American Indians did a great deal more for the cause of civilization and for America. They bought liberty bonds (not including the fourth issue) of a value of $15,000,000; also thousands of war-savings certificates; they contributed liberally to the Red Cross, and made 100,000 hospital garments for the soldiers and sailors. It would be remarkable if the kindred of the Indians who have fought on land and sea for the Stars and Stripes were not proud of their heroes, and it is quite natural that when our statesmen are pleading for the small nations and talking about self-determination the aboriginal people of America should desire personal independence and the rights of citizenship for those of their number who are still living on reservations under the supervision of the Indian Bureau. In September last the Society of American Indians in convention at Pierre, S. Dak., adopted a platform, in the preamble of which it was said:

"The close of the war should see the legal status and condition of the Indians greatly improved. A grateful Government and people will not withhold from the native American race full rights as freemen under the Constitution. For this primary right and fundamental claim of the original occupants of the land we make renewed demands. It is the greatest anomaly in history that the Indians in this land of their nativity should be deprived of the privileges of democracy, the liberty which they love and crave, and should be subjected to reservation restrictions and petty oversight and control, without a citizen's rights or a voice in the Government."

The Indians in conference urged "the division in severalty upon the books of the Government of all funds held in trust by the United States for all Indian tribes, and that these individual accounts be paid as soon as possible," adding: "Annuities and doles foster pauperism and are a curse to any people capable of independence and desirous of the self-respect and esteem of their fellow men." Congress was asked to abolish the Indian Bureau, which "was never intended to be a permanent part of the Interior Department." These intelligent Indians, of course, understood that many of their people on the reservations were not ready for citizenship, and that therefore it should not be given to the backward by a stroke of the pen. They also knew that under the law of 1887 an Indian could sever himself from his tribal relations and qualify for citizenship, but they were speaking for the reservation Indian under the blight of dependency, handicapped by restrictions upon his liberty and the development of his faculties, who feels a sense of injustice, knows his people have been wronged by the white man, and is helpless if not benighted.

Gentlemen of the House, I say to you that the crying need to-day of the American Indian is simply the opportunity to get out into the world and make his way. As an illustration of it there was an Indian over in France in the American Army. He had $200 coming to him, granted by this Congress, as a per capita payment. It was his money. He wrote and asked that the superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes send him a portion of this money, as he needed it in France. The reply went back to his wife that it was impossible to send the money over. I received a letter from that Indian, in which he said in his broken way—

It is funny to me, my wife full blood, got more sense than agent. She able to send money to me.

And I say to you that he expressed my sentiments. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the matter brought out by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] with reference to employees in the Government departments. I have understood from these gentlemen and from others who have spoken here from time to time that the departments in Washington are overcrowded with employees. I understand that that is generally believed and generally known; in fact, that a number are leaving, although more are staying, of course, than taking advantage of the opportunity to leave and have their fares paid home. But if it is a fact that the departments are full to overflowing with Government employees, then there is no sense for the War Department or the Navy Department to hold here in Washington men who are in the military service, the Army or the Navy, to do mere clerical work. I remember a few days ago I had a request from a widowed mother in my State asking for the discharge of her son, who was here at Camp Meigs receiving $30 a month running a typewriter, acting as a stenographer and typewriter, whereas he had a position at home which he had been compelled to give up, but which is now open to him, by which he might support his widowed mother, paying him $125 a month.

I had another case similar to that here in the Medical Supply Depot, where two young men were seeking to get out in order that they might take advantage of good positions which are open to them. They are working here in the Medical Supply Depot in the Government service, doing clerical work at $30 a month.

When I asked a gentleman in the medical supply depot of the War Department why they had to keep men here who came for the war, who are doing clerical work at $30 a month, and deprive them of the opportunity of going home and getting back into their positions in civil life and supporting their dependents, they told me they must keep these men because they can not get anybody through the civil service to do the work. The colonel out in the supply depot told me yesterday that he had been trying faithfully to obtain from the Civil Service Commission men to do the work—typewriting, bookkeeping, and things of that kind—and after continuous appeals to the Civil Service Commission they had been able to get only two men, and that they had to keep the soldiers there to do the clerical and other work in order to attend to the Government business. If that is true, why not take some of the men who are overcrowding the other departments in Washington and put them into these positions, which are purely clerical ones, so that the boys who want to go home and go to work can do so? In my judgment the Civil Service Commission ought to find some way to improve these conditions. I spoke of it the other day when we were considering the appropriation for the continuance of the Civil Service Commission, and I repeat now what I said then, that in my judgment the Civil Service Commission is not rendering to the Government and to the people the faithful and efficient service that it is supposed to render when it does not furnish men for the departmental work in Washington, so as to relieve the men who are wearing uniforms, who are here for the war, and the war being over ought to be sent home and other men put into these positions who will be paid a proper amount. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has 25 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to yield a little time to myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this is a very important measure, consisting in all of appropriations amounting to something over $11,500,000.

In the four years that I have served on this committee it is a pleasure for me to say that in the discussion and investigation of the items contained in the bills which have been offered here there has never been developed any political acrimony or discussion of any kind. Usually it has been the policy of that committee to endeavor to arrange the matters brought before it on a basis that would insure the greatest saving to the Government and to the Indians and at the same time produce an improved operation of the Indian Bureau and of Indian affairs.

What little success has been obtained the members of this committee are fully as well aware as am I. It has been very difficult in the past, and it still is difficult, to bring about improvements such as are suggested from time to time by members of the committee.

In this bill we have increased to some extent the reimbursable items. I might say that the bill is made up of three principal items—treaty items, reimbursable items, and gratuity items. The total amount of the bill which we are now discussing, and of these three items, is $11,580,000. The present law carries $11,066,000, being an increase this year of something like $500,000. That increase is very largely in reimbursable items, due to the fact that during the last year, the period of the war, it was decided by the committee to refrain from new construction, and in some cases we held up improvements. But now that the war is over it has been thought advisable, in view of assisting in every way to reemploy those men who went to the war and those who are being relieved from war activities, to again institute new construction to some extent. There are some other items in the bill involving new legislation that I will discuss a little later.

In the aggregate the gratuities amount to something like $4,668,000, representing 43 different activities through an increase only of $182,000. The policy and theory upon which we worked was that while there was no increase permitted for school-teachers or superintendents, those being cared for by the general law, the committee thought the department entitled to some consideration and some increase in view of the great increase in the cost of living at the present time as compared with the cost at the time we made the previous bill. So we have allowed them on subsistence, transportation, and so forth, a matter of about 12 per cent increase, allowing no increase at all in such items as salaries, superintendents, and so forth.

I have prepared two sheets, one of them dealing with reimbursable items, giving items that have been increased or decreased, so that it will be an easy task for any member of the committee who desires to compare what we are proposing to undertake with the current law, and it will be a simple matter to refer to the figures and secure the desired information.

For instance, I have sat here for several years and heard these bills, as they were being read, and find an item of $250,000 for irrigation, or something of that sort, but I have had nothing before me to show how much was used or what amount exists under the present law. It seemed to me that by having a sheet to compare the items which have actually been changed in the bill anyone can refer to them and then refer to the page in the hearings and get immediately the reason for the increase or decrease of that item.

It will be noticed also that the committee is continuing the policy of a year ago of basing the cost of schools on the actual average attendance of pupils instead of the former policy of basing it on the per capita enrollment. We are continuing the policy again this year, which is a complete check on the total amount of appropriations in each item for the support and maintenance of each school. In other words, if we have an appropriation for an Indian school and a certain amount of money, based on an estimate of average attendance, and it is found the attendance falls below, only the amount we allow in the bill per capita for the support of the schools can be spent.

It will be noted that the limitation under the item "Per capita cost" might appear in the figures to have been increased over department estimates from $200 and $225 to $225 and $250. Attention, however, is called to the fact that the language of the limitation carried in the estimates is based on enrollment, while that carried in the bill as reported is based upon actual attendance. This, your committee thinks, places the limitation of these expenditures upon a more stable basis and in the end works in the interest of economy.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HASTINGS. Would it interrupt the gentleman's argument to call attention to the other reform which we inaugurate, and that is to cut out the words "available until expended"?

Mr. SNYDER. I am glad the gentleman from Oklahoma brought that to my attention. I am pleased to say that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], a member of the committee, has, in season and out of season, insisted on removing from the bill the words "available until expended." This year the committee has adopted the policy of eliminating those words. For several years we have appropriated for certain items in the bill, and then we would find in a year or two that nothing had been done with the appropriation, or perhaps it had been used for some other purpose.

So that certain activities we have been anxious to have moved and the committee's ideas carried out have been apparently and religiously laid aside until such time as the bureau gets ready to use the money in its own way. Therefore we decided to make the moneys available for this year only. The moneys that we appropriate for certain purposes after investigation are to be expended in the way the committee desires them expended. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, before taking up another portion of the gentleman's remarks, will he state from his experience on this committee what is the tendency in regard to the gratuity appropriations, whether there is any indication that at any time in the future there will be a decrease in these items, so that we may look forward to a time when this whole anachronism in our Government will be removed and the Indians will become self-supporting people like other people?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I regret to inform the gentleman that the information which I have gained leads me to believe that about the last thing the bureau ever desires to do is to let loose of any Indian or his money; but it has been my policy and practice since I have been on the committee to get the money which belongs to him just as quick as I can and to get rid of the Indian just as quick as I can. [Applause.] I further believe, as some one stated here this morning, that in many sections of the country the Indians for whom we are providing, for whom we are operating activities, are just as capable of operating their own properties and using their own money in their own way as are many, many white American citizens throughout this country. Therefore, I say again that it has been my policy and practice to do as I have stated, and I certainly see nothing now which will lead me to believe that I shall change my ideas about it.

Mr. TILSON. What about those to whom it is a gratuity? Is there any hope that these Indians will become at some time or other entirely self-supporting and be on the same plane with other American people?

Mr. SNYDER. I will say to the gentleman that against my advice and judgment we have, within the past two or three years, taken aboard again tribes of Indians who have been discharged for years and years, I guess nearly a hundred years, and it was due entirely to a sympathetic idea, losing sight of the legal phase, simply because the Indians were poor and because we did not insist upon making the State in which these paupers exist do its share and care for these Indians. We have again entered upon the policy of taking back the Indians who have left us, either from their own desire or because of some limitation placed upon them. I am absolutely opposed to that. I believe that when a tribe of Indians has been finally discharged and put on its own resources within the borders of a State, the responsibility of the Government of the United States has ceased, and the State should take up its burden and handle the proposition as any other State in the Union would and ought to do.

I do not know that I have much more to say. I ask unanimous consent to append to my remarks these schedules which I have arranged here, so that anyone desiring to have the information quickly with regard to any item can find the comparison here.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has called attention to one reform adopted in this bill, seeking to discontinue the life of the appropriations beyond the fiscal year. May I inquire whether the committee has called upon the Bureau of Indian Affairs for the amount of the appropriations that are available, carried in prior acts, which have not been used or have not entirely been expended, and what is the total amount of those appropriations?

Mr. SNYDER. Of course we have that in the hearings, in the justifications for each of these items. The moneys unexpended and available for further expenditure are included in these items, and if the gentleman is interested in any particular item he can find it by referring to the page in the hearings that would cover the item he has in mind.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to commend the committee for preparing a report this year which embodies a splendid innovation, and which will prove of great value to the Members of the House in directing the attention of the House to the page of the testimony referring to a particular item, so that a Member need not roam about the hearings as we were compelled to do yesterday in consideration of the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill. The report filed here indicates the amount of the current law, the amount estimated, and the amount allowed for the next fiscal year, and in addition thereto gives the page at which the discussion of it may be found in the hearings, a very excellent arrangement, for which the committee deserve commendation.

Mr. SNYDER. I will say that these sheets that I am appending to my remarks have opposite the items also the page of the hearings, so that anyone can refer to them. I do not think that there is a single item in this bill that has not been fully discussed. I think we went to the bottom of every one.

By permission of the committee, I append herewith the papers to which I have referred, and will state that so far as this side of the House is concerned general debate is ended, and we are ready to proceed with the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule. [Applause.]

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

This measure is divided into three general sections—treaties, reimbursable items, and gratuities—each section containing many items. The total appropriations in this bill as recommended and in the present law under these sections are:

	Under this bill.	Under present law.
Treaties	$834,860.00	$801,120.00
Reimbursable	3,291,514.94	2,984,965.00
Gratuities	7,453,645.95	7,280,400.00
	11,580,019.89	11,066,485.00

REIMBURSABLE ITEMS.

The committee made several changes in this section—some over the estimates and some over the present law and the estimates. The total amount of reductions in these suggested appropriations was $119,000, and the total amount of increases aggregated $1,124,300. The items thus changed, and whether the change is plus or minus, are shown as follows:

Page in hearings.	Item.	Present law.	This bill.	Plus or minus.
4	Surveying and allotting reservations	$50,000	$10,000	−
7	Irrigation, reservations	250,750	268,050	+
66	Industry among Indians	150,000	100,000	+
85	Payment for supplies	None.	500,000	+
123	Irrigation system, Pima Indians	15,000	20,000	+

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SURVEYING AND ALLOTTING INDIAN RESERVATIONS (REIMBURSABLE).

For the survey, resurvey, classification, and allotment of lands in severalty under the provisions of the act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. L., p. 388), entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians," and under any other act or acts providing for the survey or allotment of Indian lands, $10,000, to be repaid proportionally out of any Indian moneys held in trust or otherwise by the United States and available by law for such reimbursable purposes: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for the survey, resurvey, classification, or allotment of any land in severalty on the public domain to any Indian, whether of the Navajo or other tribes, within the State of New Mexico and the State of Arizona, who was not residing upon the public domain prior to June 30, 1914.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The appropriation carried in this item in the pending act is $50,000. I notice that it has been reduced to $10,000. That awakens a query in my mind as to whether the land on Indian reservations has been entirely surveyed at the present time.

Mr. HAYDEN. I can assure the gentleman that is not so. There are vast areas, particularly in my own State, of Indian reservations that have not been surveyed. I tried to interest the surveyor general of Arizona to induce him to do this surveying out of the appropriations available. If the gentleman will note, in the hearings it appeared that there was available, from the unexpended balance from past years, $245,000; $97,000 was expended, leaving an unexpended balance of $148,181. I took the matter up with the surveyor general of Arizona, and he informed me it was utterly impossible at this time to get surveyors to do the work because the engineering profession had very largely gone into the war. The Indian Office gives a similar reason for having this large unexpended balance on hand. It therefore appeared proper to the committee at this time to make only a nominal appropriation of $10,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in last year's act that the appropriation carried there was to remain available until expended. Of that balance of $148,000 how much is available?

Mr. HAYDEN. I imagine all of it. That language—"to remain available until expended"—has been carried generally in this bill for years, particularly in reference to this item.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the Surveyor General has at his disposal nearly $150,000 for surveying land on Indian reservations.

Mr. HAYDEN. Of the United States as a whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose until the reservation is open to settlement there is no pressing need of a survey of reservations?

Mr. HAYDEN. But in probably all of the Indian reservations there is a demand on the part of the Indians for allotments. A great many Indians desire to have some land of their own which they can call a home, and an early survey of the land is desired on that account.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman give any information of a general character as to how many reservations have been completely surveyed and how many only partially surveyed?

Mr. HAYDEN. On page 5 of the hearings the gentleman will find a long list of reservations marked "opened," "partly opened," "not opened" (containing surplus areas), and so forth. If a reservation is opened it must have had a survey, and if it has been partly opened it must have been partly surveyed.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit, it is also possible for a reservation which has not been opened at all to have been surveyed.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; but when a reservation is opened it must have been surveyed.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The survey is the last step before the opening of the reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment and move to strike out the last word. I want to inquire of the chairman of the committee as to the nature of section 26, and I want to inquire in reference to that at this time because possibly it will save questions, from myself for one, as to the other sections in the bill preceding that. As I understand it, the $2,325,000 provided for in section 26 is to come from funds of tribes in trust. Now, I do not understand from the reading of that whether it means to say sums, as may be required for equalization of allotments, education of Indian children, per capita and other payments to Indians, or whether it means those sums are of that nature——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Under existing law the bureau is authorized to expend money for classification and allotments and for per capita payments.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Without any appropriation being made?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Out of this sum of $2,325,000 are sums which have not been carried in bills in specific appropriations here, but which the department already has under existing law the right to use?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit, he will note that this applies only to tribal funds which, I take it, the gentleman understands——

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I mentioned that.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Prior to last year there had been built up from the adoption of different treaties and from the adoption of different acts of Congress various standing appropriations from which the department was authorized to use certain amounts of Indian funds. After having those appropriations it was not necessary that they should come to Congress each year to get this amount specifically appropriated, and Congress has no record whatever of those amounts, has no way of knowing how much of the Indian funds they were spending under these standing appropriations.

Some two years ago the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL] proposed an amendment which set out that there should not be any expenditure from tribal funds in the future without a specific appropriation by Congress except for equalization, the payment of per capita, payment of schools, and so forth. Last year the department did not bring in a specific estimate, an itemized estimate, so the Indian Committee called on them for the items that had been expended under this, and then their record of the amount that had been expended and would be expended in accordance with the expenditures the year before, and so forth. Now, this year we bring in here a specific itemized statement of every dollar that is to be expended from these particular Indian funds.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Then is the $2,325,000 included in the estimate of the total appropriations in the bill of $11,000,000?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It is in addition to it?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is in addition. These are tribal funds, and the $11,000,000 is the amount of the real tax upon the Treasury.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. This is all entirely from the trust funds of the tribes in the Treasury?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Entirely from the trust funds.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Take, for instance, in Iowa, Sac and Fox, $1,200 in last year's bill, was that included in any place in the bill at all?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. My recollection is it was not, and while I am answering that question I will say during the time this bill was being made up I was confined to my bed——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Last year it was not specifically itemized——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have just answered that.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Are there any amounts taken from specific appropriations?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit, I was confined to my room by illness and not able to be in attendance on the committee, and the other members of the committee very courteously went ahead and reported these items, so there are some items in the bill with which I am not as thoroughly familiar as the House might expect me to be.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Does the gentleman understand that there are any of these items in section 26 or any part of any items specifically appropriated under the several States which were formerly included that by reason of being included in this bill at this place would in any way decrease the amounts that had been included in other bills under other sections?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. There are none?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. All of this amount, then, is in addition to what has been included in sections of former bills?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; but which should have been spent under standing appropriations.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. But without requiring special authority——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Without specific annual authority by Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction, repair, and maintenance of irrigation systems, and for purchase or rental of irrigation tools and appliances, water rights, ditches, and lands necessary for irrigation purposes for Indian reservations and allotments; for operation of irrigation systems or appurtenances thereto, when no other funds are applicable or available for the purpose; for drainage and protection of irrigable lands from damage by floods or loss of water rights, upon the Indian irrigation projects named below.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will some member of the committee advise us what policy has been pursued in making appropriations for the respective paragraphs which appear on pages 3, 4, and 5, as carried under this general heading?

Mr. HAYDEN. Prior to a year ago this irrigation appropriation was carried in a lump sum of about a quarter of a million dollars. The committee concluded that these projects should be specifically set out, so in the estimate this year the various projects were itemized and then arranged separately in the hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the committee has allowed all the projects that were recommended by the bureau?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir. You will find on pages 8 to 13 of the hearings a detailed statement relating to these projects—where they are located, and so forth.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, for irrigation on Indian reservations, $268,050, reimbursable as provided in the act of August 1, 1914: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended on any irrigation system or reclamation project for which public funds are or may be otherwise available: Provided further, That the foregoing amounts appropriated for such purposes shall be available interchangeably in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior for the necessary expenditures for damage by floods and other unforeseen exigencies: Provided, however, That the amount so interchanged shall not exceed in the aggregate 10 per cent of all the amounts so appropriated.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the bill for the fiscal year 1918 these items were carried and the amount—$244,700—was carried in one provision without specification of the different projects on which they are to be used. In this bill the projects are specified, and of the total amount carried—$268,050—I find that approximately $89,500 are for the items for necessary miscellaneous expenses incident to the general administration of Indian irrigation projects, including salaries, and not including supervising engineers, whereas the remaining amount carried in this bill is for construction, repair, maintenance, and so forth. Will the chairman or some other member of the committee tell me what the idea is for the segregation of the items in the bill at this time?

Mr. HAYDEN. The idea is that the committee wanted information so that they might look into the merits of these various Indian projects, and in case there were any of them where a good explanation could not be made for the expenditure of the money, they might be disallowed. It is only by having the bill submitted in this shape, by having a justification for each individual item, that it is possible for the committee to keep any kind of a check upon such expenditures.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not a fact that these items, specified as they are in this bill, has enabled the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH] to ask these questions as to how much of this will be used for irrigation charges and how much for overhead charges and for other expenses by the Bureau of Indian Affairs? Otherwise nobody would have known how much of it would be used for irrigation purposes and for other expenses.

Mr. HAYDEN. But with a lump-sum appropriation salaries may be increased or decreased, but here we have appropriated specifically for a certain number of persons at certain salaries.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I am glad the gentleman from Kansas suggested that these specific items for which we appropriate in this bill enable one to understand for what purpose they are being used. The thought occurs to me that possibly where a certain amount being for an Oregon project, or a southern Idaho project, or Nevada or Utah project, where it specifies a certain amount for administration expenses, instead of this having a tendency to cause an elimination of some of the administrative expenses, where it might otherwise do so, they would be transferred from one to another to keep the work going on, and it might have a tendency to have the administration expenses go up to the amount which is specifically provided for in the law, and it might possibly increase the administrative expenses over the proportion of expenditures of the actual work on the irrigation projects.

Mr. HAYDEN. I hardly think that is possible, because we segregate the construction from the salaries and expenses in the various irrigation districts. As far as the overhead is concerned, most of it is appropriated for in one place.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Just for that very same reason—if, for instance, an item for the overhead expenses and administrative expenses were all included in one, if it were seen there was a thousand dollars left for administrative expenses and, say, about $500 for actual work, which might be a fair proportion in some cases, if there were not two distinct appropriations separating the amount paid for administrative work from the amount for actual work, there might be more work.

Mr. HAYDEN. The total sum appropriated here is not large enough to encourage waste. And we allow the Indian irrigation service some leeway by permitting the transfer of 10 per cent of the total amount from one project to another in case of an emergency.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. The question is whether or not the proportion appropriated in this bill for various projects for administrative expenses is really out of proportion to the amount appropriated for irrigation work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUPPRESSING LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

For the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors among Indians, $125,000: Provided, That on and after July 1, 1919, possession by a person of intoxicating liquors in the Indian country or where the introduction is or was prohibited by treaty or Federal statute shall be an offense and punished in accordance wtih the provisions of the acts of July 23, 1892 (27 Stat. L., p. 260), and January 30, 1897 (29 Stat. L., p. 506).

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee, or some member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, whether or not the treaties made with Indians provide for this expenditure of $125,000? Does this come out of tribal funds?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No. This is a gratuity. No treaty requires it.

Mr. KNUTSON. This comes out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It comes out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I notice that one year ago, for the purpose of the suppression of the liquor traffic among the Indians, this bill carried $150,000. A year ago the different legislatures in the different States were then in process of voting upon the question of whether or not the Nation should be dry territory. Before this bill was reported into the House the number of States required by the Constitution for ratification of the amendment submitted to the States had ratified the constitutional prohibition amendment, which, long before the time in which this appropriation ought to be used expires, will make the United States entirely dry territory.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. In a moment. I understand it is not compulsory upon the department to use all of this money, but it seems to me it is a sad commentary upon our action in the House here, in view of liquor legislation in the country and liquor legislation that we shall be called upon to enact here in the future for the suppression of the liquor traffic—it seems to me it is a rather sad commentary to say that with the conditions changing as they have been in the last year the reduction is only from $150,000 to $125,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. That matter was thoroughly discussed in the committee, and the committee realized that, so far as the constitutional prohibition amendment is concerned, it will not go into effect until a year from now. In the meantime it will be necessary for Congress to pass legislation to enforce it. This Indian appropriation bill goes into effect on the 1st of July, 1919, and we wanted to be sure that the Indians would be protected from the sale of intoxicating liquors until the Nation becomes "bone dry."

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I understand that about one-half of all the Indians are in the State of Oklahoma. Is not that true?

Mr. HASTINGS. About a third.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. That State is dry?

Mr. HASTINGS. It always has been; that is, the eastern part. The Indian Territory was always dry. Oklahoma has been dry since Statehood.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is old Oklahoma the Indian Territory?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire whether Oklahoma is only dry so far as the statutes are concerned or dry in fact?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is like Iowa. It has oases in desert places that are dry. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOOD. Iowa has not always been dry. The gentleman from Oklahoma says Oklahoma is always dry. I remember traveling across the country at a not far distant time, and I traveled through Oklahoma, and I saw gentlemen on the train that did not give evidence that they had always been dry, or that they were dry at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. As a good citizen, why did not the gentleman give evidence to the court?

Mr. GOOD. I was on the train. I did not want to get into court. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. He was desirous of getting out of dry territory into wet. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RELIEVING DISTRESS, AND SO FORTH.

For the relief and care of destitute Indians not otherwise provided for, and for the prevention and treatment of tuberculosis, trachoma, smallpox, and other contagious and infectious diseases, including transportation of patients to and from hospitals and sanatoria, $375,000: Provided, That not to exceed $45,000 of said amount may be expended in the construction and equipment of new hospitals at a unit cost of not exceeding $15,000: Provided further, That this appropriation may be used also for general medical and surgical treatment of Indians, including the maintenance and operation of general hospitals, where no other funds are applicable or available for that purpose: Provided further, That out of the appropriation herein authorized there shall be available for the maintenance of the sanatoria and hospitals hereinafter named, and for incidental and all other expenses for their proper conduct and management, including pay of employees, repairs, equipment, and improvements, not to exceed the following amounts: Blackfeet Hospital, Montana, $12,500; Carson Hospital, Nevada, $10,000; Cheyenne and Arapahoe Hospital, Oklahoma, $10,000; Choctaw and Chickasaw Hospital, Oklahoma, $35,000; Fort Lapwai Sanatorium, Idaho, $40,000; Laguna Sanatorium, New Mexico, $17,000; Mescalero Hospital, New Mexico, $10,000; Navajo Sanatorium, Arizona, $10,000; Pima Hospital, Arizona, $10,000; Phœnix Sanatorium, Arizona, $40,000; Spokane Hospital, Washington, $10,000; Sac and Fox Sanatorium, Iowa, $25,000; Turtle Mountain Hospital, North Dakota, $10,000; Winnebago Hospital, Nebraska, $15,000; Crow Creek Hospital, South Dakota, $10,000; Hoopa Valley Hospital, California, $10,000; Jicarilla Hospital, New Mexico, $10,000; Truxton Canyon camp hospital, Arizona, $10,000; Indian Oasis Hospital, Arizona, $10,000.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask some member of the committee why no provision is made for hospitals among the Minnesota Indians? I realize that Minnesota is a very healthy State; in fact, one of the most healthy States in the Union; but it would seem that the Indians of our State would be subject to little ailments as they are in other parts of the country. I would like to know what provision is made to take care of sick Indians in Minnesota and the Northwest. I fail to find any items here in this bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They have their hospitals. The sick Indians of Minnesota are taken care of now, as a great many Indians are taken care of in Oklahoma, out of tribal funds.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why should we differentiate between the various tribes? They are using the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians for every conceivable purpose. They tack every man possible onto the pay rolls where the money comes out of the tribal funds of the Chippewas. They do not get a thing out of the Government. If we are to have a free-for-all grab bag here, I would like to have the Chippewas put onto it. Here is an item of $375,000, and the Chippewas are not mentioned in it at all. Other sections of the country are mentioned—Arizona, New Mexico, Iowa, Washington, North Dakota—but not Minnesota. Were any hearings had upon the situation with reference to Minnesota?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There was no proposal. It has not been the policy of the Committee on Indian Affairs to invite an estimate for the expenditure of money at any place that the department does not propose, and the department proposes nothing for Minnesota. Therefore the committee had the right to assume that the State of Minnesota was being taken care of without any further expenditure from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not see why the Chippewas of Minnesota should be compelled to pay for their hospital treatment out of tribal funds when such is not the case in other sections of the West.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If it were "a grab bag," as the gentleman from Minnesota says, that would be true; but on that hypothesis I do not see why the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma have to pay practically all their own educational expenses while other tribes of Indians get theirs free. But back in 1886 an act of Congress was passed giving the Secretary of the Interior the right to say that the education of the tribes should be conducted at the expense of the tribes. In 1889, I believe, a treaty was made with reference to what should be done with the educational funds of the tribes. The department is pursuing the directions of that treaty, and the Committee on Indian Affairs has gone into the matter as thoroughly as it could here in Washington, but it has not been able to determine just whether the provisions of the treaty are being complied with, and probably it may not be able to determine such facts until some investigation is made by the Committee on Indian Affairs on the ground.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think a uniform rule should be established in cases of this kind?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; you could not do that, because in some cases the Indians have no funds at all, although they are just as much entitled to the consideration of this Government as are the Indians who have funds, because perhaps at an earlier day those Indians owned valuable lands which the Government permitted to be taken away from them by the white settlers of those States, and if so, certainly the Federal Government has a moral obligation to discharge with respect to them, the same as it has in discharging it toward Indians who have tribal funds to their credit.

Mr. KNUTSON. I maintain that the Government owes a moral obligation to the Chippewa Indians.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Perhaps so. I will not dispute with the gentleman about that, because I do not think there is a man on the floor of the House, I do not think there is a Member of Congress, who knows enough about the Chippewa situation to say exactly whether we are doing the right or the wrong thing in this bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think a thorough investigation should be made of the Chippewa situation by a committee of this House?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. A few moments ago I expressed myself in favor of that as strongly as I could, and said I did not think any equitable and fair settlement of this matter can be made until an investigation is provided and a committee authorized to go and look into the matter upon the ground, and for that reason we have placed the last section in this bill, providing for an investigation.

Mr. KNUTSON. I sincerely hope that will remain in the bill.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. I want to inquire whether these hospitals, aggregating $375,000, are exclusively for the benefit of the Indians, or are there hospitals to which this Indian fund applies that admit other people?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They are exclusively for Indians.

Mr. GARD. No other persons except Indians?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No. No other person is admitted to an Indian hospital or to an Indian school, as a rule; although I think in some places they do permit a few white children to come into Indian schools on payment of tuition.

Mr. ADOLPHUS P. NELSON. In regard to the inquiry that my colleague [Mr. KNUTSON] made, would this same investigation apply to the Chippewas in Wisconsin as well?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That was put in for the purpose of taking care of that particular situation and some others, and I hope that the gentleman will see the necessity for this thing, and the inadvisability of making a point of order against it. It is subject to a point of order if made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Just a word upon these hospital items. They are for the benefit of all Indians. If, for instance, there are Chippewa Indians who are sick with tuberculosis, they may be taken to the tuberculosis hospital at the Sac and Fox Reservation located in Iowa, but which is for the benefit of any Indian who may have tuberculosis, whether he comes from Minnesota, from Wisconsin, from Oklahoma, or any other place. And so of other hospitals for like purposes provided for in these items.

Mr. KNUTSON. Do I understand, from the gentleman's remarks, that these are general hospitals open to anyone?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Open to the Indians who are provided for by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SUPPORT OF INDIAN SCHOOLS.

For support of Indian day and industrial schools not otherwise provided for, for other educational and industrial purposes in connection therewith, $1,750,000: Provided, That not to exceed $40,000 of this amount may be used for the support and education of deaf and dumb or blind Indian children: Provided further, That not more than $200,000 of the amount herein appropriated may be expended for the tuition of Indian children enrolled in the public schools: And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the support of Indian day and industrial schools where specific appropriation is made.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELLSWORTH: Page 7, line 22, after the colon insert: "Provided further, That no part of this appropriation, or any other appropriation provided for herein, except appropriations made pursuant to treaties, shall be used to educate children of less than one-fourth Indian blood whose parents are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they live and where there are adequate free school facilities provided and the facilities of the Indian schools are needed for pupils of more than one-fourth Indian blood."

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is repeating existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was going to call attention to the fact that this was made permanent law in the 1918 bill.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I did not know whether it was or not. I observed that in the 1918 bill this language was included and in this bill it was not included. The present bill appropriates $1,750,000, while the bill of two years ago appropriated $1,550,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will look at the bill that he is reading from, he will find that it says "hereafter," which makes it permanent law.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I had overlooked that. I withdraw the proposed amendment and offer to amend by striking out on page 7, line 16, the figures "$1,750,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "$1,550,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the former amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will report the amendment now proposed by the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELLSWORTH: Page 7, line 16, strike out "$1,750,000" and insert "$1,550,000."

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I offer that amendment because I think there is a growing tendency in the Indian Bureau to reach out through their agents and inspectors in communities where Indian schools are maintained, especially day schools, and where Indian pupils have matriculated in the public day schools, in some instances going 15, 20, or 30 miles and taking Indian children who ought to be in the public schools. I do not know whether there is any ulterior motive for it on the part of the bureau; but in the future, as restrictions are removed and Indian funds are distributed per capita, where the competency commission which is now determining the competency of Indians finally removes the restrictions, the expenditures to be made through the Indian Bureau will become so lessened that the Indian Bureau employees, inspectors, agents, and so forth, will not have sufficient work to do to maintain the positions that they now have at the salaries that they now receive. This being so, I think there is, unconsciously, perhaps, a tendency on the part of the bureau to reach out and build up the schools, and use the schools as a sort of a black man Friday to keep expending on to maintain the Indian Bureau service. And because the matter of education always strikes the heart of everyone interested in the Indian subject, either here or outside of this body, it can always be used as a good excuse why the bureau should reach out here and there and take in different children and bring them out of the public schools into the Indian schools.

It is this civilizing influence that we want, to keep the Indian children in the public schools intermingled with the children of the white schools, and in every community where it has been done the Indian has made his greatest progress.

But aside from that I believe that $1,550,000 will give as much school service and will have a tendency toward stopping interference with Indian children going to the public schools.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, last year there was appropriated $1,650,000 for the Indian schools. The solution of the Indian question is in education. Liquor should be kept from the Indian, and he ought to be educated industrially and otherwise. Supplies are much more expensive than a few years ago, and the bureau and the committee ask for only $100,000 in addition to what was appropriated last year, a very modest sum.

Mr. Meritt, the efficient deputy commissioner, testified that because of the advance in the cost of supplies these schools can not be carried forward properly without this additional appropriation. The Indian Bureau, as well as the committee, is very anxious to economize and cut down expenses. We cut by $25,000 the appropriation for the suppression of intoxicating liquors, and we have added $100,000 for the conduct of these schools. The item does not carry any appropriation for teachers' salaries, but is expended solely for the immediate extra cost and additional requirements.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs stated positively that this was not to provide for increased salaries, but that the increase was asked for solely on account of the increased cost of supplies.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have so stated.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to ask if the cost of supplies during the fiscal year should come down, would this item show a balance at the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to say that in considering this item we took into consideration the possible increase in the period we are legislating for, and only allowed about one-half of what we actually thought the department ought to have under this item in case the cost should remain the same as it is to-day; that is, if prices should keep up. But we believe that during the period we are legislating for the cost will go down to such an extent that the amount we gave would compensate for the increase of cost over that period.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many schools does this contemplate caring for?

Mr. TILLMAN (reading)—

The amount requested, $1,750,000, is $100,000 more than the amount in the 1919 act. The fund is required for support and education of Indian children in all schools for which no specific appropriation is made or use of tribal funds authorized, including day schools and public schools where tuition is paid. Forty thousand dollars of this amount is requested for payment of expenses in connection with the education of deaf or blind Indian children. Defective children who are unfitted for attendance at schools for normal children are being placed in institutions suited to their needs as rapidly as accommodations can be found for them.

From reports for the school year 1918 it is found that there are, in all, 90,555 Indian children of school age, of whom 4,881 are ineligible for school attendance, leaving 85,674 to be provided for in Government, public, or private schools.

The following enrollment is shown: In Government boarding schools, 10,842; in nonreservation boarding schools, 11,464; in Government day schools, 6,215; making a total of 28,521 enrolled in Government schools.

There are also enrolled in private and mission schools 5,459, and in public schools 29,496, so far as information has been received. This makes a total of 63,476 Indian children in all schools of whatsoever character.

I will state that frequently where it is convenient the Indians attend the public schools, and a sum of money is appropriated for the purpose of paying a portion of their tuition in these schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. This paragraph carries an appropriation as in the act of last year of $200,000, which may be made available for that purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. For what purpose?

Mr. STAFFORD. For educating the Indians attending the public schools, but my inquiry was directed to the specific information as to the number of schools that receive support out of this appropriation; not the number of Indians that are being supported at Government boarding schools and Government day schools, but the number of schools that were receiving support from this appropriation other than those specifically provided for later on in the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. The hearings do not disclose the number of schools, but simply the number of pupils.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman furnish the information as to how many schools receive the benefit of the appropriation of $200,000 where the Indian children are enrolled in the public schools?

Mr. TILLMAN. Twenty-nine thousand four hundred and ninety-six Indian pupils are thus educated.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is giving the number of children but not the number of schools. I am asking for the number of schools receiving support.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I stated before, the record does not disclose the number of schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the chairman of the committee furnish information as to whether the $200,000 fund is used only in certain sections of the country, or is it disbursed wherever Indian children are attending public schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is distributed wherever the Indian children attend public schools proportionately, as I understand from the bureau, with the exception of eastern Oklahoma. The gentleman knows that we carry here an appropriation for the Indian children attending public schools in Oklahoma. That appropriation was $300,000, cut down to $275,000. Last year in the committee on conference I agreed that now, since some of the lands are being sold and the Indian lands were becoming taxable, it would be a good idea to gradually reduce that amount. So we reduced it $25,000 last year and have agreed to reduce it that amount, $25,000, every year until the amount is entirely eliminated. This money is expended in every State—I should say in many of the States, not in every State, because sometimes there are only a few Indians, but in every State where there is a considerable number of Indians this money is expended in public schools, with the exception of the eastern part of Oklahoma.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I understand that these children, in order for the schools to be entitled to this fund, must be children of Indians who are not citizens?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; the gentleman probably gets that impression because of my referring to eastern Oklahoma. No; even children who are citizens, if they are less than a certain degree of blood, could in some States have their tuition paid from this fund, because there is such a thing as an Indian not being a citizen and still having his land restricted and not subject to taxation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then is that the reason why you make a specific provision later on in the bill allowing the fund that last year for the first time was voted for the support of the Mississippi Choctaws to be used for the support of children in the public schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not recall just what the Mississippi Choctaw proposition says.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is new language in this bill, as follows, on page 28:

SEC. 9. That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $75,000 for the full-blood Choctaw Indians of Mississippi in the Indian appropriation act of May 25, 1918, is hereby reappropriated for the same purposes for which originally appropriated and for aiding the common schools attended by the children of said Indians under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The new language is "and for aiding the common schools attended by the children of said Indians under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In the past the Mississippi Choctaw children have not been permitted to attend any of the schools except the schools that were established by the State of Mississippi for them. So I assume that this is to aid those schools that have already been established by the State of Mississippi for the Mississippi Choctaws.

Mr. STAFFORD. Getting back to the original proposition, Is there any certain amount that the Bureau of Indian Affairs grants to the public schools, based upon a per capita allowance for each pupil?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. All is based on a per capita allowance. I do not know what it is now. It was 10 cents a day up until this year, but I have not looked through the hearings to find out what it is now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDIAN SCHOOL AND AGENCY BUILDINGS.

For construction, lease, purchase, repair, and improvement of school and agency buildings, and bridges, including the purchase of necessary lands and the installation, repair, and improvement of heating, lighting, power, and sewerage and water systems in connection therewith, $350,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for the payment of salaries and expenses of persons employed in the supervision of construction or repair work of bridges and on school and agency buildings in the Indian Service: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to allow employees in the Indian Service who are furnished quarters, necessary heat and light for such quarters without charge, such heat and light to be paid for out of the fund chargeable with the cost of heating and lighting other buildings at the same place: And provided further, That the amount so expended for agency purposes shall not be included in the maximum amounts for compensation of employees prescribed by section 1, act of August 24, 1912.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the three provisos and would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. In what places and in connection with which schools is it proposed that this $350,000 shall be used? Which schools are to benefit by this $350,000?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. All schools where there is a need for an Indian school and agency buildings.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In nearly every instance the committee always has—and I think it does in this case—carried a specific appropriation for buildings and upkeep and repairs for each individual school, as the school is reached and provided for.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit, this provides for reservation schools. We only appropriate specifically for the nonreservation schools.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is probably the general policy; but it is not quite true. There are some nonreservation schools so provided for specifically in the bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. All of the nonreservation schools are provided for specifically; but the so-called reservation school is not provided for but is taken care of in these general items.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That explains it.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will yield, the hearings show that the total value of buildings at these reservation schools is $7,500,000. This request for $350,000 for the upkeep of the buildings would amount to 4⅔ per cent of the present value of the property, which is a fair amount for maintenance and upkeep of buildings of that value.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This does not seem to me to be too much. I want to direct attention to one school that I am somewhat personally interested in. The Indian school at Tower, Minn., is never appropriated for specifically in the bill. The upkeep of the school is provided for from some other source. I think they take it out of the revenues that come to the Indians of Minnesota themselves, and I know of one or two other places. The department one year sort of makes up its mind it will perhaps discontinue the school and next year it makes up its mind that it will continue it and enlarge it, and then the next year it changes its mind a little on that. Many of these buildings have gotten into a bad state of repair at this school as well as at some other places. Is there any provision made in the Indian Office for an investigation of these various schools to determine which ones shall be retained and what it is necessary to do to put them in proper condition?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman mean by the bureau itself?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They have what they call, as I presume the gentleman knows, supervisors of education, who with their other duties have this duty imposed upon them.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am sure that it is the purpose of the committee, and a splendid one, that wherever a school is to be maintained it ought to be maintained in a reasonably good and sanitary condition.

Some very serious complaints have come, as the gentleman well knows, in the past of the insanitary and unhealthy condition which prevails in some of these schools. I think that condition still exists to a considerable extent. I was in hopes this fund might be used by the Indian Bureau in eliminating those things. They do not seem to be doing it, though.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Funds which are used for the supervisors can be used for that purpose. I repeat the statement I made a few moments ago, that what is really needed is an investigation of the schools and other branches of the Indian Service not by the bureau itself but by the Congress—by the House of Representatives.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There is not any doubt at all in my mind that is true, and I sincerely hope the House will grant authority for the Indian Committee to make this investigation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will say we have a provision in this bill for an investigation by members of the present House Committee on Indian Affairs who have been elected to the next Congress, and if no point of order is made against that section we will probably be able during the next summer, unless we have an extra session of Congress, to look into a great many Indian matters and perhaps bring back some valuable information to the Congress.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman assure the committee that this is the policy of the Indian Office and of his committee—to get Indian children into white schools as far as possible—if that is the policy which they have?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That certainly is the policy of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think it is a most commendable policy and one that ought to be prosecuted with the utmost vigor. This differentiation in localities between Indian children and white children is a damnable difference and a serious discredit to both races, and I think retards the development of the Indians to have the community look upon them as something separate and apart from the white people of the community. Now, is the Indian Office carrying out this policy?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, that is one of the things we want to investigate. I could not tell the gentleman. The bureau claims it is. We have not any first-hand information on the subject.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would be in favor of increasing the previous sum of a million and three-quarters and increasing this item to a reasonable sum just to enable the department to carry out that program in every State in the Union where Indians are to be found, especially where they are mixed blood.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, the gentleman knows that as the Indians are placed in white men's schools just to that extent will the Indian problem be solved and to that extent will the bureau be relieved of supervision of the Indian, and, without attempting to reflect upon the head of the bureau or anyone else, the gentleman knows as well as I do that the establishment of a man's full citizenship and taking him out from under the supervision of the Indian Bureau actually means a decrease of that bureau, so we are calling upon the Indian Bureau to do the abnormal thing—to eliminate themselves.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It may be abnormal, but it might be recommended.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Recommended, but perhaps not accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to make one further inquiry. I think the gentleman should explain the last proviso and let us know exactly what it means. I was in doubt at first:

That the amount so expended for agency purposes shall not be included in the maximum amounts for compensation of employees described in section 1, act of August 24, 1912.

Mr. SNYDER. The only change from this item of last year, if the gentleman pleases, is the extension of the limitation by adding the words "and bridges." It may refer to that. The bureau claimed that this item was so limited that they were unable out of this money to fix a bridge, so we, as the gentleman will see, page 8, line 2, added after "buildings" the words "and bridges."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is also added in line 9.

Mr. SNYDER. I was myself disposed to keep the limitation just as the clause is, and it was my belief that this appropriation was sufficient to do all the work that is necessary to do under this heading, provided the work was efficiently and well done.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular? Heretofore if the bureau wished to erect a bridge on an Indian reservation it had to come to the Congress for specific authority. There are numerous instances in the bill reported to the House of provisions for the building of bridges on reservations which are to be paid out of the tribal funds. Now, under the authority you carry in the bill there may be constructed bridges out of the $350,000 without requiring——

Mr. SNYDER. No.

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). Them to be reimbursed from the tribal funds.

Mr. SNYDER. No; it does not contemplate any such thing.

Mr. STAFFORD. It may not be contemplated, but I contend that it does not grant authority to do that.

Mr. SNYDER. I was not intended to grant any such authority. It was the intention of the committee to grant authority to repair bridges.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it was only intended to grant authority to repair bridges, I respectfully submit that the language in line 9 is adequate to meet that condition, and the words "and bridges" in line 3 should be eliminated.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The words "and bridges" in line 3 are in connection with schools, and it would authorize the construction of a bridge——

Mr. SNYDER. Nothing of the sort.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. For ordinary purposes?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not agree with the construction of the committee, and I respectfully submit that that is an erroneous construction.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I read it two or three times, and when I first read it I had somewhat the same idea of the gentleman, but in reading it later I believe the reasonable construction is that it is simply authority to repair and this is a provision in connection with schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have authority for the construction of agency buildings. These agency buildings do not have to be connected with school buildings.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I did not quite state it fully. I accept the correction—"schools and agencies."

Mr. HASTINGS. Why not knock out "and bridges," in line 3?

Mr. STAFFORD. I made the point of order for that purpose. I have no objection to the repair of bridges. If the chairman of the committee has no objection, I make the point of order to the words "and bridges," in line 3.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is satisfactory.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota withdraws the point of order, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] makes the point of order against the words "and bridges," in line 3. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Just a moment. That does not refer to "and bridges" in line 9?

Mr. STAFFORD. Only in line 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter, except for pay of superintendents and for transportation of goods and supplies and transportation of pupils, not more than $225 shall be expended from appropriations made in this act, or any other act, for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any Indian school, unless the attendance in any school shall be less than 200 pupils, in which case the Secretary of the Interior may authorize a per capita expenditure of not to exceed $250: Provided, That the total amount appropriated for the support of such school shall not be exceeded: Provided further, That the number of pupils in any school entitled to the per capita allowance hereby provided for shall be determined by taking the average attendance for the entire fiscal year and not any fractional part thereof: Provided further, That all moneys appropriated for school purposes among the Indians for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, may be expended, without restriction as to per capita expenditure, for the annual support and education of any one pupil in any school.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to make a statement in reference to this last paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the point of order for the purpose of explanation.

Mr. SNYDER. The committee saw fit to put in this reservation here on account of the fact that there has been a great deal of sickness on the various reservations, due to influenza, and so on, and the expense has considerably increased, and since we have adopted the plan in this bill elsewhere of making appropriations available only in the year which we are appropriating for, we thought that under the existing circumstances and the emergency it was not wise to put on a limitation for the balance of the year.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit me, it could not be greatly abused, because this bill will not likely become a law before the 4th of March, and there would be only three months remaining until June 30. And the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the representatives of schools everywhere say that these Indian schools must stop unless there is some such provision placed either in this or some other law, and the cost in the schools has gone up, because of influenza and for other reasons, during the present year.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a relief measure to meet exigent conditions due to the influenza?

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. What limitation is lifted by this proviso?

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, the appropriation made for this school is based on a certain limit of $200 to $225. The limitation is that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The available remaining appropriation for the respective schools will now be for the remainder of the fiscal year for the support of those schools, regardless of per capita enrollment?

Mr. SNYDER. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL EXPENSES OF INDIAN SERVICE.

For pay of special agents, at $2,000 per annum; for traveling and incidental expenses of such special agents, including sleeping-car fare, and a per diem of not to exceed $3.50 in lieu of subsistence, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, when actually employed on duty in the field or ordered to the seat of government; for transportation and incidental expenses of officers and clerks of the Office of Indian Affairs when traveling on official duty; for pay of employees not otherwise provided for; and for other necessary expenses of the Indian Service for which no other appropriation is available, $135,000: Provided, That $15,000 of this appropriation shall be used for continuing the work of the Competency Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I understand that in the bill providing for the expenses for the fiscal year 1914 the amount carried in this item was $105,000 and for 1913 it was $125,000. I think the chairman of the committee stated a year ago when this bill was up that there were three competency commissions in Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Two, I think it was, at one place.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Three individuals on each commission?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Three individuals on each commission and two commissions at one place. If the gentleman will permit, I have just been advised by a Member of Congress that there were two commissions that came into a certain town in Oklahoma at the same time to do the same work—two competency commissions.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. How many have been declared competent in the last year?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. As the gentleman knows, I was not at the hearings of the Indian Committee and perhaps some of the members who were there can tell you.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think about 1,500.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. There were 1,532.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. To the extent of the number of Indians that are declared competent the number of incompetent Indians is decreased?

Mr. HASTINGS. Among the Five Civilized Tribes there are 101,506. Of these about 75,000 are Indians, and of these about 37,000 were restricted Indians; and it is estimated one-third of those have died, leaving about 25,000 living. The restrictions have been removed from some, and the testimony in the hearing shows there are estimated to be living about 23,000 restricted Indians among the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Does the gentleman think that in the last seven years the work of the competency commission has or has not increased?

Mr. HASTINGS. We have not had a competency commission out there in the last seven years. A competency commission was down there this year. Heretofore they went before some local agent and made application, and the local agent reported to the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes, and he reported to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs reported to the Secretary of the Interior.

The competency commission goes out and visits each Indian at his home. They make an investigation concerning him and make a report upon each application direct through the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior, and if that is approved he is adjudged to be competent and his restrictions are removed.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. The competency commission sometimes hold their meetings in cities and villages and subpœna witnesses before them. Do they have authority to subpœna witnesses?

Mr. HASTINGS. Last year they pursued the policy of going about from place to place in eastern Oklahoma, where Indians came to visit the competency commission and went before them; and I understood they took as much testimony as they thought it necessary to take. Part of it was transcribed; I do not know how much. My understanding is that under the present instructions the present competency commission, of which Maj. McLaughlin has been a member until the last few days, is instructed to go out and visit the home of every Indian making application for the removal of his restrictions. Now, just how much testimony they took I do not know; whether they took any, I do not know; but I know they have been pursuing that policy during the present year.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. One of the things that I did not develop in my efforts to develop things before the committee was this: When an Indian desires to demonstrate his competency, does he have to make an application himself, or does the department make the examination on its own account?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. He does it without the competency commission. The competency commission examines all Indians they come in contact with without application.

Mr. SNYDER. That is what I wanted to bring out. Does this commission inquire of these Indians themselves in order to find out whether they are competent or not?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes. That is, as I think, the fair thing to do. In most cases outside of Oklahoma, where the land of the Indian is restricted and where he holds a trust patent, his land is exempted from taxation. Therefore you find the most intelligent Indians in a great many instances are the ones who do not want their restrictions removed.

Mr. SNYDER. Does it not seem absurd that with these competency commissions in operation there are only 1,500 Indians in Oklahoma who have been declared competent?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what I say. While the competency commission was continued in the appropriation for last year, there was a change in the personnel, and they did not really get to Oklahoma until October, so that they did not work there, as I understand, in July, August, and September, and three months were lost.

Mr. SNYDER. It is difficult to find out just what these competency commissioners did do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, one of the things that the competency commission found among the most intelligent Indians, as stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], is that they do not want their restrictions removed, and do not want to be declared competent. While they remain under their restrictions they do not have to pay taxes on their land and on their incomes, and many of them have large amounts of money; and they are just competent enough to know that if they remain "incompetent," they will not have to pay taxes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not find many people in the States who are very anxious to pay taxes unless they have to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Indian is not so incompetent as the Indian Bureau here would have the general public believe.

Mr. HASTINGS. I would add that the removal of restrictions from the homesteads of restricted Indians would not make the homestead taxable as long as the allottees held it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That only applies to the homestead?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That only applies to Oklahoma. In other sections where an Indian is given a fee patent the land immediately becomes taxable, and he takes upon himself all the duties of United States citizenship. I think there are two others besides this.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. If the condition which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] speaks of is universal this amount ought to be decreased pretty soon.

Mr. HASTINGS. The department insisted on an increase of $10,000 in this item, but the committee did not allow that. It cut it down.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It seems there ought to be fewer applications in the future than there have been in the past.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think that will be true in another year.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They do not have to make application with the competency commission.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. They do not?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; but that simplifies the matter. When the man goes to the competency commission himself and it determines his qualifications that report is sent to Washington. It does not pass through the hands of a subordinate agency, but comes to Washington to the Secretary, and the Secretary himself either approves or disapproves that application, and I do not believe he has ever disapproved any application that the competency commission has passed upon. That cuts out red tape.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. So the competency commission can determine whether a man is competent or not, regardless of what the Indian himself wants?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, does not the gentleman think that in a case like that cited by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] the man should be required to be emancipated?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is a report sent to the department with a recommendation that he be declared competent.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is as it should be.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In an investigation upon the Yakima Reservation in 1913 there came before our committee a young man who had blue eyes and light hair and did not appear to have any of the characteristics of an Indian. I said to him, "What do you want?" He said, "I have a complaint to make." I said, "What is that?" He said, "The agent has allowed too much consideration and paid too much money for expenses in planting an orchard on my land." I said, "What is your land worth?" He said, "About $2,000 an acre." That sounds unreasonable to anyone unacquainted with that country. I said to him, "Did you take it up with the agent?" He said, "Yes; but I could not get anything out of it; he insisted on paying this excessive amount for the trees." I said, "How much Indian are you?" He said, as I recall, "I am a quarter," or "I am an eighth." I said, "Why don't you get your restrictions removed, so that you can attend to your own affairs." He said, "I do not want my restriction removed. It is too valuable." I said, "Then do not bring your complaints to me." I think whenever an Indian is found to be competent he ought not to be placed on examination at all. He ought to be declared competent absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDIAN SERVICE INSPECTORS.

For pay of six Indian Service inspectors, exclusive of one chief inspector, at salaries not to exceed $2,500 per annum and actual traveling and incidental expenses, and not to exceed $3.50 per diem in lieu of subsistence when actually employed on duty in the field, $25,000.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the figures "$25,000" on page 13, line 17, and inserting in lieu thereof "$21,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELLSWORTH: Page 13, line 17, strike out "$25,000" and insert "$21,000."

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I notice that in the bill of two years ago the salaries were the same as in this bill, $2,500, the number of inspectors was the same, and the per diem was $3. In this bill, with a per diem of $3.50 for the same number of inspectors at the same salaries, the amount appropriated is $5,000 less than it was two years ago. Two years ago the amount carried in the bill for six inspectors at $2,500 each salary and $3 per diem was $30,000. Now, it seems to be perfectly apparent that that means one of two things:

Either the work that these men were doing was not necessary and it was not necessary for them to travel, or if it was necessary then it is not necessary now; and if it is not necessary for inspectors to travel, then it seems to me they would not be doing any work. If it is necessary and if they do travel, if they are doing the same work now that they did two years ago and ought to do it; then the total amount, with the per diem raise and everything else remaining the same, ought to be larger. If these services were rendered in good faith and this provision is inserted in good faith, it seems to me the amount ought to be more. The fact that it is reduced, regardless of the fact that the salaries and number of the inspectors are the same and that their per diem is larger, it seems to me is fair evidence, at least on first blush, that it could be almost dispensed with entirely. Certainly it seems to me that this is the kind of an item that we ought to begin to reduce at this time.

Mr. HAYDEN. The reason the committee made the reduction was because there is on hand an unexpended balance of $10,333.39, which is explained by the Indian Office to this effect:

> There is an unexpended balance of approximately $10,000, occasioned by vacancies in the personnel of the force from time to time, but with the full force now appointed and in active service the amount asked for will be almost entirely hypothecated during the fiscal year.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. What was the unexpended balance two years ago? I do not mean for the fiscal year 1919, but for the fiscal year 1918—the law passed in 1917.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. It was $10,300.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I am told that the unexpended balance at that time was about $10,000 also, so that that would not answer the question at all. It would look as though it were contemplated to reduce the amount, while at the same time the same number of people were employed at the same salaries.

Mr. HAYDEN. Congress may authorize the employment of an indefinite number, but the actual number employed will depend on the amount of money appropriated. We thought, in view of the unexpended balance from the preceding year, it was entirely proper to cut the amount $5,000, which we did, and I think the gentleman ought to commend the committee for its action.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I do commend the committee for it, and I rather think the amount ought to be cut more. My amendment proposes to cut it more. Inasmuch as the amount remaining unexpended two years ago was about the same as it is now, it seems to me that it is very easy to read between the lines that this sort of service is one which the bureau is very anxious to maintain, and it seems to me that without any injury at all to the service it might be cut to three inspectors and $15,000. I would even be willing to vote for that.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the Indian Bureau was anxious to spend the money, if it was doing what the gentleman suggests, all the money would have been used and there would have been no unexpended balance, which shows that the bureau is likewise to be commended.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I think perhaps the bureau and the committee both ought to be commended, and I think the amount ought to be reduced.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the gentleman who has offered this amendment I will state that if the amendment were carried it would not provide enough money for the pay of six inspectors. Under ordinary circumstances these inspectors would draw a per diem of about $1,000 a year. Their salaries, at $2,500 each, would be $17,500, which, plus $6,000 for the six inspectors for per diem, would make $23,500. With six inspectors they could not possibly get along with the amount he suggests.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. What do these six inspectors do?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. They are supposed to check up these agencies.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Check them up—to see who is there and whether the Indians are competent?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. To see whether these moneys are properly expended and to investigate complaints that are made about the various agencies.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Do they go into the Indian schools to see whether there are Indian children in the Indian schools who ought to be in the public schools?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. They are supposed to do that. Whether they do or not, I do not know.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, these inspectors are really representatives of the Indian Office out in the field, and they go there as representatives of the Indian Office and inspect the Indian Service everywhere and make confidential reports.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. And if they find an Indian child somewhere in the public schools who they think ought to be taken to the Indian schools, do they recommend that that child be taken from the public schools and put in the Indian schools?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Most of the inspection done by these inspectors is the inspection of agencies and of the officials of the bureau, as I am sure the gentleman from Minnesota knows. In other words, the inspectors inspect.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Do they inspect the books of the agencies and the accounts of the Indians and so forth?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They do.

Mr. SNYDER. The chairman of the committee will appreciate that for several years we have attempted diligently to find out what these inspectors did, and it seemed to me that they were a sort of committee that went out and overlooked the situation, if they went at all; and I have tried to reduce the number every year, and made the same attempt this time, but the commissioner seemed to want us to understand that these men were more or less his confidential advisers in the field. We thought that while this was a great plenty, if they worked all the time they ought to get all the information he required. I am in sympathy with the gentleman from Minnesota on his amendment, that it could be safely cut down.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I agree with the gentleman from New York that we have not before the committee been able to get a great deal of information from the bureau as to these inspectors, but I can understand why that is.

Mr. SNYDER. The chairman will remember that we cut out two inspectors a year or more ago.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have had opportunity to observe these inspectors on the different reservations, and from my observation I have made a statement as to what they did. I remember that a Mr. Deming, who was one of the inspectors, inspected the Carlisle school, and inspected before that the school in Washington at the Yakima Agency at Fort Simcoe, and I happened to be present while he was making those inspections. Maj. McLaughlin, whom we all love and whom we have heard the gentleman from Minnesota eulogize, is the oldest Indian inspector in the service, and has made one of the most valuable reports to this Congress of certain phases of the Five Civilized Tribes that could be imagined.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I suggest that Maj. McLaughlin is under the Secretary of the Interior direct, and is sent out by the Secretary of the Interior, to whom he reports direct.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. He is a member of the competency commission, but prior to that time he was under the Indian Bureau.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Is he paid from this item that we are now discussing?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I understand that Maj. McLaughlin has just gone off the competency commission. Whether he is now in the Indian Service or not I do not know. I do not know in what capacity he is.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. My understanding is that he is provided for under the Indian department.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. He was a member of the competency commission, but I heard a rumor that he had retired.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. He is now a special inspector under the Interior Department.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman has later information than I have.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I wish to correct a statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER]. The six inspectors provided for here are not the ones that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] referred to. The six he referred to were the oil and gas inspectors in Oklahoma. They were reduced to four. The six inspectors here are the ones commonly known in the agency and among the Indians as "Cato Sells's eyes," and I have been reliably informed that two were in Oklahoma fighting my reelection on account of a certain stand I took against the Indian Bureau last year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to say that an employee of the department engaged in pernicious activity seeking to defeat a Member of Congress because that Member had the courage to express his views on the floor and sought to have his views carried out in legislation?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I have been so informed; and not only that, but I was informed that one inspector went down there opposing in the primaries a Democratic candidate for nomination.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. An oil and gas inspector?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No; not an oil and gas inspector but one of these six inspectors.

Mr. STAFFORD. Such character of conduct should be severely condemned. I never heard before of any employee of the Government using his time, even after office hours, seeking to defeat either the nomination or election of a Democratic or Republican Member of Congress. We all know that under the presidential order he has the right to exercise the privilege of a citizen, but when he becomes so perniciously active as to go out of the way and seek retribution against a Member of Congress because he is doing his full duty in trying to economize and safeguard the interests of the Treasury it is high time that that man should be disciplined.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is as bad as the Security League. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. No; this is in the open. Wall Street uses the Security League as a camouflage to carry out their purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

VEHICLES FOR INDIAN SERVICE.

That not to exceed $200,000 of applicable appropriations made herein for the Bureau of Indian Affairs shall be available for the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of superintendents, farmers, physicians, field matrons, allotting, irrigation, and other employees in the Indian field service: Provided, That not to exceed $15,000 may be used in the purchase of horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles and not to exceed $40,000 for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and that such vehicles shall be used only for official service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The committee has increased the amount for motor-propelled vehicles for the Indian Service from $30,000 to $40,000. I rise to inquire as to the number of automobiles in the Indian Service in the field and what the average cost of those automobiles is and the life of them.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not know that we developed from the commissioner the number. Inquiry was directed about the increase from $30,000 to $40,000 of motor-propelled vehicles, and our investigation was along that line. My memory has been refreshed by the hearings. On page 79 the gentleman will find the commissioner said:

There are 339 passenger-carrying automobiles, 60 automobile trucks, 2 automobile ambulances, and 2 motorcycles. We have 900 horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles and 300 drayage and farm wagons in the Indian Service.

Perhaps that is the information the gentleman wants.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the hearings develop the average price for these passenger-carrying automobiles?

Mr. HASTINGS. I believe not; but it was stated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that he bought the cheaper kind. They are practically all Fords.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For initial payment for goods and supplies purchased for the Indian Service, $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available and to be reimbursed, by transfer through accounts of disbursing officers or otherwise, from appropriations and funds which are applicable for the various agencies, schools, and projects to which the goods and supplies are subsequently distributed: Provided, That the sums so reimbursed may be reexpended under the same conditions in payment for other purchases made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. I believe this is a new provision delegating to the bureau new authority that has not been heretofore vested in the bureau. I think some explanation should be made of that item carrying $500,000.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I will say for the information of the gentleman that this fund is asked for by the bureau in order to create a new method of purchasing the supplies for the various activities under the Indian Bureau. Heretofore the policy has been once a year, at least, to ask for bids upon certain commodities that the bureau has to buy. Those bids are opened in two or three different places within the borders of the United States. A contractor whose bids are accepted has been put to the trouble of waiting for his money for such purchases until such time as the commodity finally arrives at its destination, which may be after it has passed through a Government storehouse, has laid there for several weeks or months, and then finally gets to the school at the reservation, where the articles are finally checked up and the bill finally checked up. It was thought that by giving the Government a sufficient amount of money so that it could purchase in much larger quantities than it ever purchased before, with the understanding that the merchandise is to be paid for on a commercial basis, within 10 or 15 or 20 days after purchase was made, cash discounts might be taken advantage of and better prices might be obtained by reason of the fact of the seller knowing that within a certain reasonable length of time he is going to get the money for the goods that he sold. Therefore they have asked for this amount of money, which is wholly reimbursable, and it really never leaves the Treasury at all except for a short period.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a fund for the accommodation of the sellers of merchandise to the Indian Bureau.

Mr. SNYDER. It is an accommodation to both of them, and it is thought that it will make a great saving in the purchase of merchandise, not only for the bureau but for the schools.

Mr. STAFFORD. Have any specific instances been called to the attention of the committee wherein contractors have charged the Government higher prices by reason of the system now in vogue, which the gentleman has described?

Mr. SNYDER. Except by the bureau itself. So far as I know, no contractor has complained in the presence of any member of the committee with regard to this usage that is now in force.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GANDY. I have had a great deal of correspondence from people who have sold or contracted for various articles to the Indian Service, complaining of the long delay caused by not being able to get payment for the articles sold. It was the understanding of the committee that in creating this $500,000 fund it was simply creating a revolving fund, out of which invoices might quickly be paid for and then the money restored to the fund from the proper appropriation. This is not an increase in the appropriation at all but only provides a revolving fund, from which these purchases may be immediately paid for.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know of any other instance where the Government has appropriated half a million dollars for the purpose that is intended in this paragraph.

Mr. SNYDER. It is really not an appropriation; it is simply a loan of a certain amount of capital with which to do business.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is a business man.

Mr. SNYDER. And this appealed to me as a business proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet the Indian Bureau is insignificant in the amount of its purchases as compared with other activities of the Government.

Mr. SNYDER. They buy several million dollars' worth of goods per annum.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amount is insignificant as compared with the purchases made by the War and the Navy Departments and by the Agricultural Department, and yet you are here providing a system that has not been adopted, so far as I know, by any of the departments of the Government.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman will have to admit, however, that these items that are purchased by the bureau are shipped to infinitely more remote sections of the country, North, East, South, West, and that takes a long time, and during that period one who sells the Government must wait for his pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is one of the conditions of doing business with the Government.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman understand that in this case it is simply a case of the Government having to wait for its money instead of the seller having to wait for his? The Government gets a return for the money it advances from the school itself. The school returns the price of the merchandise, or the invoice, when it receives these goods, and checks them up. It pays the bill just the same, but it pays the bill to the Government, and with that the Government is reimbursing itself for the money it gave to the seller in the first place.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under existing practice the bureau desires supplies and it advertises for them and contractors submit bids. The bids are awarded and then the supplies are furnished, and when the bill is received I presume that the department pays the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman's assumption is not well grounded, because it does not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is there any law that prevents the bill being paid on presentation of the bill of lading?

Mr. SNYDER. I presume there is nothing in the law, but the policy or the rule is such that it is not paid until the goods reach their final destination. I am not tenacious as to this at all; it is not an invention of mine; but it looks to me like a good business proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would hardly ascribe it to the gentleman from New York, knowing his good business judgment and knowing his desire to protect the Treasury.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment to me? Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. When I first saw this item, after it was placed in by the committee, I was inclined to be alarmed over it, but after having had read to me the reasons suggested by the assistant commissioner in the investigation of him by the gentleman from New York and others, I made up my mind it was a good proposition. Now, what does this do——

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to allowing this paragraph to be passed over temporarily? It is too important a provision, and I have not had time to examine this as I have some of the other items, and I do not wish to urge the point of order, as I would be compelled to do, until I can look further into the matter.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I would be very glad to do so, and I think if the gentleman does look into it he will not be inclined to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that this paragraph be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Subject to the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For reimbursement of A. R. Snyder for expenses incurred by him in repairing his personal automobile which was damaged while used on official business, $27.20.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph beginning lines 3 to 5.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, this is to reimburse A. R. Snyder, who is superintendent at the Pottawatomie Agency out in Kansas. There was some disturbance occasioned, as I now recall, by some drunken people, and it became necessary for Mr. Snyder to use his own personal automobile in taking some officials from that place out to a point on the reservation, and after they got there some one connected with it set on fire this automobile and it was damaged to the amount of $27.20. He was out there on official business; had to use his own automobile to take some officers out there. He is superintendent of this agency, and the department recommended this item, and we made an investigation and we thought it was fair, and for that reason we incorporated it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman recognizes the danger of incorporating in an appropriation bill paragraphs for the payment of a private claim as an inducement to another body to load the bill down unreasonably with all kinds and manner of claims.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, we had this experience before, and I think the committee of the other body understand it thoroughly, that it is the rule that there will be no claims included in the House Indian appropriation bill. This extends no further back than the last fiscal year, and it is only for a small amount. We have had no difficulty in making them understand that rule for a great many years past, and we have gotten along very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, with the assurance that the gentleman will exert his strong and mighty power in preventing any additional claims from being added that might not be justified——

Mr HAYDEN. The House conferees will follow their uniform policy and keep off all of these claims.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, under the conditions, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, wherever in his discretion such action would be for the best interest of the Indians, to cause a final roll to be made of the membership of any Indian tribe; such rolls shall contain the ages and quantum of Indian blood, when approved by the said Secretary are hereby declared to constitute the legal membership of the respective tribes for the purpose of segregating the tribal funds as provided in section 28 of the Indian appropriation act approved May 25, 1918 (40 Stat. L., pp. 591, 592), and shall be conclusive both as to ages and quantum of Indian blood: Provided, That the foregoing shall not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes or to the Osage Tribe of Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. I think some explanation should be given as to the reason for this new authorization.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the hearings disclose that the department asked for this authority in view of the fact that on a great many of these reservations they were making up rolls, and they were making allotments and wanted to wind up the affairs of a good many of these tribes, and they said this provision would expedite it. You will note that the committee added some little additional language to that suggested by the department. For instance, we thought future legislation by Congress would be based perhaps upon the degree of blood, ages, and so forth, so that we added to the suggestion of the department that these rolls should be made conclusive both as to ages and quantum of blood, following the custom set by Congress with reference to the making of the rolls conclusive as to ages and quantum of blood among the Five Civilized Tribes, which was done several years ago, as the gentleman recalls.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do.

Mr. GANDY. In the Indian appropriation bill of last year there was carried a provision authorizing the pro rating of the tribal Indian funds in order that the department might know and that the Indian might know just what his share or her share is in those funds. The department held after the bill had been passed that it could not undertake this prorating work until the rolls had been completed and that they did not then have authority of law to complete the rolls on a number of the reservations, and this simply gives them the authority to complete the rolls and when they have then they may take up the pro rating of the tribal funds as was authorized in the appropriation bill of last year.

Mr. STAFFORD. What expense will be occasioned by the grant of this authority?

Mr. GANDY. I may say that the rolls—practically the work is completed all over the country.

Mr. HASTINGS. There will be no additional expense other than the employees on the various reservations; that is, there will be no additional employees. There will be no additional expense. It is contemplated that the employees there will do the work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has not the department authority at the present time to cause the rolls to be made of all the Indians and has not the department such rolls and possibly as minutely as described in this paragraph?

Mr. GANDY. It is my understanding that they do have that authority, but not the authority to complete it, or, in other words, to close it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit me, here is the difficulty: Suppose you make the roll of a tribe and you have had no congressional expression that that is an official roll. There is not any end of the settlement of an Indian tribal estate. A child that is born to-morrow will assert the right; a child born next year will assert a right and it goes on indefinitely and interminably. Here is a proposition which, I think, if the gentleman had time to give it the fullest consideration, he would agree is really a step toward the winding up of Indian affairs, because you can not allot—you can not divide—tribal funds; you can not take care of the Indians in the schools; you can not do anything of that kind until you have found his status as an Indian.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can agree that in many instances that the roll should be finally concluded, but are there not some Indian tribes in this country which are not so advanced and wherein you do not wish to bar all such children from those rolls?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman, that even if you should close up all the rolls to-morrow you would not do any great violence to any of the Indians, because each Indian child would inherit from its father's, or mother's, or brother's part when they passed away.

Mr. STAFFORD. They might not inherit as much as they would in case they were singled out as entitled to one full quota.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They might not inherit as much or might inherit more, as the chances go all through life. I agree with the gentleman that the better time to make the roll is just prior to the time you make the division, but the division can not be made until the Secretary has the right to make the roll, because you have not the divisor.

Mr. HASTINGS. And neither the land nor money.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If we should undertake to divide any estate where Congress had not said the roll was final, then after that estate was divided there would be nothing on earth to prevent the children that were born afterwards coming back on the Federal Government and saying they wanted their share of this estate, because it has not been settled by Congress or by the courts, or anyone else, and they are just as much Indian as the others were.

Mr. STAFFORD. Looking forward 25 years is taking a very radical view of some few tribes being in existence on reservations where their lands are not allotted.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That will probably be true in 25 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet you would foreclose, perhaps, many persons subsequently born by reason of closing the roll.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The provision is not mandatory.

Mr. HASTINGS. He is authorized to do this in his discretion.

Mr. GANDY. Let me give the gentleman a concrete example. On the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota the agreement with the Indians was that the Indians then living should be allotted. Congress afterwards, some 18 or 20 years ago, both increased the size of the allotment and provided that the children should be allotted. Congress has never closed the roll, and as a result the land has all been allotted, and of children—some newly born and some 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 years of age—there are now about 600 unallotted on that reservation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Let me say to the gentleman this: The safe thing to do, both from the standpoint of the Indian and the standpoint of the Federal Treasury, is to have affirmative action by Congress for the closing of any roll. If we do not have that, then these other claims will spring up in the future as I have stated they have sprung up in the past.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Do either of the gentlemen from Oklahoma think that a commission ought to be created or it ought to be specified in what way the department should make the appointment of those who are to make the determination of those to go on the roll?

Mr. HASTINGS. It will be made by the superintendent. The rolls have been made and they are ready now to be approved, and they want the authority by Congress. It is so testified by the commissioner.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Would it be made in the usual course, by those under the civil service?

Mr. HASTINGS. Those in charge of the various agencies.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all of the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats. L., p. 1007), as extended by the act approved April 11, 1916 (39 Stats L., p. 48), be, and the same are hereby, extended for a period of three years from and after the 4th day of March, 1918.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What is the purpose of this legislation?

Mr. HAYDEN. By the act here cited exchanges of lands were authorized in New Mexico, Arizona, and California where Indians have been residing on railroad lands for five years prior to the passage of the act, so that the Indians could obtain title to the lands on which they were residing and the railroad companies might obtain other lands of equal area and value in lieu thereof. The gentleman understands that when the transcontinental railroads were built the alternate sections were granted for 20 miles on each side of the track as a bonus for building the railroad. Certain lands on which the Indians were residing, when surveyed, were found to belong to the railroads. In order that the Indians could retain the land on which they resided, the railroad companies were permitted to select other land equal in area and value in the same State. The Government is not giving the railroad companies any more land than they otherwise would have. It is merely an exchange for the convenience of the Indians.

When this matter came up for consideration in Congress some years ago I discovered that there was no limitation at all as to how much land might be exchanged. I insisted at the time that the acreage in Arizona and New Mexico must be limited, and fixed the amount in the act at 10,000 and 25,000 acres, respectively. I also insisted that a limit of time be placed on these exchanges in order to expedite the transaction. Unfortunately the Indian Office has not completed this work as rapidly as I expected them to do it. The time fixed was three years. The Indian Office reports that there are some 100 Indians still residing on the land where the transfers are not completed. They ask for three years from the 4th of last March, or practically two years from the present time, in which to complete this work.

Mr. STAFFORD. They want the same area and value of lands as those held by the Indians?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; that is it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the development of a water supply for the Navajo and Hopi Indians on the Navajo, Moqui, Pueblo Bonito, San Juan, and Western Navajo Reservations, $30,000, to be immediately available, reimbursable out of any funds of said Indians now or hereafter available.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. I see the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] in the Chamber, as usual when this bill is under consideration. I know he has full knowledge about the various projects. I rise merely for general information, to ascertain whether any new projects are carried in these respective items relating to New Mexico or Arizona?

Mr. WALTON. None in New Mexico, as I understand.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is one in Arizona?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is one in New Mexico—the Pueblos. The items here carried are practically the same as those carried in the last Indian appropriation bill. The item for the Ganado irrigation project must be corrected by inserting the sum of $3,000. Another, for the Zia Pueblos, New Mexico, is new. The item following is the same. The item for the San Xavier Indian Reservation, Ariz., $16,500, is new, and all appropriations from Indian tribal funds, amounting to $17,500, proposed at the end of the items, are new.

Mr. STAFFORD. All those projects that the gentleman referred to are not of any very large or extensive character?

Mr. HAYDEN. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume they are minor projects, pumping stations, and the like?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The projects are not intended to involve a very heavy charge upon the Treasury in the future?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; none of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. LITTLE. I wish to inquire if there is something in the bill in regard to the Zuni Indians?

Mr. HAYDEN. I made no mention about the Zuni Indians.

Mr. LITTLE. I saw a copy of the bill, and I thought there was formerly in the bill a reference to the Zuni Indians in New Mexico. But I am not able to find it. Why is it that it does not appear?

Mr. HAYDEN. Under the head of "New Mexico" there are items for the support of the various Indian schools and certain irrigation ditches at Jimez and Zia Pueblos, N. Mex., and a road and bridge on the Mascalero Reservation. All those items will be found on page 35.

Mr. LITTLE. Since I am on my feet, I would like to ask about the Laguna Pueblos, on page 21. How extensive are the irrigating ditches there?

Mr. WALTON. The water is brought about 25 miles in the ditch.

Mr. LITTLE. Along how much of that are there farms under irrigation?

Mr. WALTON. About 2,500 acres.

Mr. LITTLE. How close is that to the pueblo?

Mr. WALTON. The pueblo is located near the Rio Grande River.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, we seem to be discussing the bill ahead of the reading. I would prefer that we go ahead in the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas withdraws his pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For operation and maintenance of the Ganado irrigation project, reimbursable under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That any balance of the $20,000 appropriated by the act of May 25, 1918 (40 Stat. L., p. 569), which shall be unexpended on June 30, 1919, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Kansas will yield for a moment, I would like to move a committee amendment. I move to insert the figures "$3,000" after the word "prescribe" in line 5 of page 21. That was omitted. That omission is a misprint.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 21, line 5, after the word "prescribe," insert "$3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I was inquiring in regard to the Laguna Pueblo Indians in New Mexico, where about 2,500 acres are under irrigation. I wish to inquire of the gentleman what is the nature of the improvement?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, once more I arise to ask the gentleman to defer his remarks until we have reached the paragraph in question.

Mr. LITTLE. The Clerk did read it.

Mr. SNYDER. No. The reading, as I understood, stopped at line 9.

Mr. LITTLE. The Clerk read beyond line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that he has read from line 9 to line 19. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the last paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For enlarging and improving the reservoir and ditch system for the Laguna Indians of the Laguna Pueblo, N. Mex., $5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. LITTLE. It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to get recognition about anything. Can the gentleman tell us how extensive this improvement is and what is the nature of the improvement?

Mr. WALTON. Some years ago the Indian Bureau assisted the Pueblos by providing sufficient funds for the construction of three dams. Two of these dams have been badly damaged by flood water, one of them almost totally washed out and the other washed around. This $5,000 is asked for the purpose of putting these dams into proper shape, so that they may put water into the laterals and the ditches.

Mr. LITTLE. Then this is simply restoration?

Mr. WALTON. That is all.

Mr. LITTLE. What success do the Indians attain in this irrigation work?

Mr. WALTON. Very good success. They are self-supporting as a result of their agricultural pursuits.

Mr. LITTLE. Who has charge of the irrigation work—the Indians or white men?

Mr. WALTON. The Indians, as far as my information goes. I can not answer that positively.

The CHAIRMAN, Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For operation and maintenance of the pumping plants on the San Xavier Indian Reservation, Ariz., $16,500, reimbursable out of any funds of the Indians of this reservation now or hereafter available.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. What is the nature of the pumping plant and what is the pumping from?

Mr. HAYDEN. The pumps are established in the valley of the Santa Cruz River on the San Xavier Indian Reservation.

Mr. LITTLE. Is the pumping done from wells?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. How deep are the wells there?

Mr. HAYDEN. I think the average depth there is 20 or 30 feet. There is a very substantial underflow from the Santa Cruz River.

Mr. LITTLE. It is a rather simple process, then?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. How much ground is covered by the irrigation works?

Mr. HAYDEN. About 9,000 acres.

Mr. LITTLE. What are these Indians—semicivilized?

Mr. HAYDEN. They are Papagoes.

Mr. LITTLE. Have they made a success of it?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. They have a very good market for everything they grow.

Mr. LITTLE. They live like the Pueblo Indians generally, I suppose?

Mr. HAYDEN. They are Papagoes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States the sum of $17,500 of any tribal funds on deposit to the credit of the Indians of the San Carlos Reservation in Arizona, and to expend the same for the operation and maintenance of pumping plants for irrigating the lands of the Indians on the said reservation, and for the installation of a tank or tanks for the economical handling of fuel oil for said pumping plants: Provided, That the sum so used shall be reimbursed to the tribe under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question for information. What is the extent of this irrigation?

Mr. HAYDEN. About 1,400 acres in the Gila Valley, on the San Carlos Reservation. The Indians are the San Carlos Apaches.

Mr. LITTLE. How long have they been there?

Mr. HAYDEN. These Indians were placed on the San Carlos Reservation when they were rounded up by Gen. Cook along early in the eighties. A good deal of difficulty has been experienced in getting the water out of the stream. Several heavy floods changed the bed of the river and destroyed the heading of their irrigation canal, so that it was necessary to establish pumping plants. One object of this appropriation is to install a tank, so that they can buy and store the fuel for the pumps in carload lots, in that way saving considerable sums of money.

Mr. LITTLE. They have been using oil before, then?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. This is to save money by putting in a tank so that they can buy their oil in wholesale quantities. This appropriation is from their own funds, and it is being made to supplement expenditures heretofore made by the Government.

Mr. LITTLE. How does the work of these Apache Indians compare with that of the Pueblo Indians?

Mr. HAYDEN. About the same.

Mr. LITTLE. They are getting the same results?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. The Apaches do excellent work on road construction in Arizona. Wherever they are employed on works of that kind they do very well.

Mr. LITTLE. They can work, then, as well as they used to fight?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman from Arizona yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Why is this language in the proviso:

Provided, That the sum so used shall be reimbursed to the tribe under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. HAYDEN. The fund we are appropriating is derived from receipts from grazing leases on this reservation, and it belongs to the entire tribe. They have an income of about $100,000 a year. The fund belongs to all the Indians, and it is proposed to take some of this money and use it for the benefit of a part of them. That being the case, whenever their lands are sold or other arrangements are made, these particular Indians should reimburse the whole tribe for this expenditure made for their benefit.

Mr. FOSTER. It means that the individual Indians will reimburse the whole tribe?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Each Indian pays his own way.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

January 1, 1919:

H. R. 13153. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, at the foot of Garrison Avenue, at Fort Smith, Ark.; and

H. J. Res. 356. Joint resolution authorizing payment of the salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1918.

January 7, 1919:

H. R. 13261. An act providing for the transportation from the District of Columbia of governmental employees whose services no longer are required; and

S. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States the sum of $17,600 of any tribal funds on deposit to the credit of the Indians of the Fort Apache Reservation in Arizona, and to expend the same, in connection with an equal sum of the funds appropriated in this act for Indian school and agency buildings, for reconstructing, repairing, and improving the power plant and irrigation system on the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz.: Provided, That the tribal funds so expended shall be reimbursed to the tribe under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That the sum of $17,600 of the amount appropriated in this act for Indian school and agency buildings is hereby set apart and reserved for this purpose.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. How many people are connected with this appropriation—how many Indians will be served by it?

Mr. HAYDEN. Does the gentleman want to know how many Indians there are on the Fort Apache Reservation?

Mr. LITTLE. How many are connected with this appropriation?

Mr. HAYDEN. About 2,500.
Mr. LITTLE. They are Apaches, I suppose?
Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.
Mr. LITTLE. How extensive is the irrigation plant?
Mr. HAYDEN. It is not altogether an irrigation matter, but is also for the improvement of the water-power plant, which was built some 15 years ago to furnish light and power and domestic water for the agency. The plant is in very bad shape. By reason of the fact that the Indians are receiving considerable sums of money from grazing fees, it is proposed that they shall pay one-half of the cost of this improvement.
Mr. LITTLE. How many white people are there?
Mr. HAYDEN. Only the employees of the Indian Service.
Mr. LITTLE. About how many?
Mr. HAYDEN. The superintendent and the teachers—I should say perhaps 25.
Mr. LITTLE. This appropriation says, "for reconstructing, repairing, and improving the power plant and irrigation system."
Mr. HAYDEN. There is a small irrigation system at Fort Apache, which, when completed, will water about a section of land.
Mr. LITTLE. Where do they get the water?
Mr. HAYDEN. They get it from White River.
Mr. LITTLE. They have nothing but a garden to irrigate?
Mr. HAYDEN. That is about all. I think they grow some corn and forage for horses.
Mr. LITTLE. Is it grown by white people or by Indians?
Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, this is in the heart of the Indian country, and the crops are all grown by Indians.
Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.
The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. For support and civilization of Indians in California, including pay of employees, $42,000.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question and obtaining information relative to this very general item of "support and civilization" of the Indians in California, and to ask what are the processes of civilization. Here is $42,000 for undisclosed processes of civilization. I would like to get some information as to what those processes are.
Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that this item, like charity, covers a multitude of sins.
Mr. GARD. I thought there was some one from California who might enlighten me.
Mr. RANDALL. Let me say that the mere fact that they are allowed to remain in California has a civilizing influence.
Mr. GARD. I have no doubt of that, but I do not understand that that calls for financial outlay. The mere privilege of remaining there is something that the white people have to pay a good deal for, I know, in a State of irrigation, imagination, and exaggeration. [Laughter.] Is there anyone that can inform me on this subject?
Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman want an explanation of how this is used?
Mr. GARD. What do they do that calls for $42,000?
Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They may do anything necessary for the civilization of the Indian.
Mr. HASTINGS. The record shows that there are 15,000 Indians in California.
Mr. FOSTER. There is no law for the appropriation of money for civilization of Indians.
Mr. HASTINGS. That is the term used. "Support and civilization" is a broad term to cover the service to the Indians.
Mr. ELLSWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I think if gentlemen would read through the bill, taking the different items for support and civilization, taking the conditions that exist, they will conclude that this means the paying of employees in the Indian Service. While a good portion of the money gets to the Indians and they get sustenance out of it, the gentleman will find that in many instances they do not get it.
Mr. GARD. If it is for the employees, why not say so candidly, instead of covering it up under the term "civilization"?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GARD. Yes.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will give the gentleman an itemized account of just how the Indians in California are civilized.
Mr. GARD. I shall be very glad to learn that, I am sure.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Salaries, wages, and so forth, $17,787.28.
Mr. GARD. Pardon me there. That I presume is for salaries and for wages of employees.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is for the white people. Traveling expenses, $2,594.84.
Mr. GARD. That makes $20,000, about.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Transportation of supplies. That is for the benefit of the Indians——
Mr. ELLSWORTH. If they ever get there.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If they ever get there—$706.67. Telegraphic and telephonic service—the Indians are great on telephoning—$412.28. Printing, binding, advertising, and so forth, $8.25.
Mr. GARD. They are strong advertisers.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; they boost their business. Subsistence supplies—that, I suppose, is for supplies that go to the agency, including the officials, the white people, who are there—$5,925.56. Dry goods, clothing, and so forth, $552.11. Forage, $1,330.03. Fuel, lubricants, power, light, and so forth—this is California, you understand, and the amendment has not taken effect over there yet.
Mr. GARD. But will the gentleman——
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, I shall get to the civilization part of it pretty soon. That is in this item—$3,513.76—medical supplies, education, and stationery, and so forth. There is the civilization—the second item in that.
Mr. GARD. How much is the educational, and so forth?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Out of that there are $3,169.31. Miscellaneous—probably there is some civilization in that.
Mr. GARD. That is comprehensive enough to include civilization.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Five hundred and ninety-one dollars and eighty-one cents. Outstanding liabilities, $1,189.81; making a total of $41,966.21. That is the amount expended in the last fiscal year for support and civilization.
Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Kansas for the information that he has furnished me, but I yet have no information as to the actual benefit in civilization which comes to these Indians in California, except the item which may include some education and medical supplies. The balance of it seems to have gone for the aggrandizement of the great white brother.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman from Ohio will follow this bill closely, he will find in every item that is for the support and civilization of Indians on Indian reservations that from 85 or 87 per cent of it goes to the white officials. The department asked for $50,000 in this item and the committee cut it down to $42,000, practically what it was last year. You can not pry the department loose with a crowbar from these agencies.
Mr. GARD. I do not desire to pry the department loose, but it seems to me there ought to be some more material benefits to go to the Indians for whose benefit these appropriations are made, instead of its going to the white man, who fastens himself on this department and refuses to be pried loose, in the language of the gentleman from Kansas.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Ohio is correct.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.
Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes.
Mr. GARD. I would be perfectly willing to take the five minutes, though I do not want it for anything except to ask some questions.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that a great many of us are interested, and for that matter for years have been trying to decentralize things here in Washington. If you take all of these Indian tribes, you will find the trouble is that there is too much of administration and not enough of civilization. You can not build a henhouse out on a reservation anywhere in the United States without first having the matter go through the local superintendent, who then sends it on up here to Washington for approval. That means that you have got to have a great many officers on every reservation. It means a disproportionate part of these appropriations is expended for salaries, for clerical force, and things of that kind. A great many of us have been inveighing against this for some time.
Mr. GARD. The gentleman thinks that the amount is disproportionate.
Mr. HASTINGS. I am sure of it, and I am glad to have the sympathetic interest of the gentleman from Ohio; and if we could get the gentleman from Ohio and other Members of the House to join with us we might get some little legislation that would enable somebody outside of the city of Washington to have some final authority on something.

But there is no man on any Indian reservation, so far as I know, who has got any final authority on anything, and for that reason you have got to have Indian agents, you have got to have stenographers, you have got to have a clerical force, and too much of this money, running in practically every item, is spent in correspondence backward and forward between the various agencies and the department here. Now we have got to get a little additional legislation so as to compel the Indian Office here to give more authority to some of its representatives on the various reservations. You could decrease the clerical force here, you could decrease the number of employees, and then there would be more money to be used for education, more money for subsistence, and less money used for salaries out there and for wages. I thought this was an opportune time to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARD. I am glad the gentleman did.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am very glad to take the opportunity to say this much at this time about it.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, the trouble with this item is it is not big enough. Members on the floor of this House know what $43,000 mean. If it had been $43,000,000 they would have passed it and would not have said a word about it. I saw a two-billion-dollar bill passed here in about 20 minutes, and the rest of the day was taken up in a discussion of whether a clerk of this House should receive an extra compensation of $250 that he had earned, and about half past 6 or 7 o'clock it went to a vote and he did not get his money. Now, the proposition is this: The Indians of California, most of them, are civilized; some of them are becoming uncivilized on account of overcivilization. I believe this money will be properly used for the education of the Indians and the payment of certain self-appointed understudies of the general overseer of the universe, who have a great respect for the Indian because there is a salary in it. Now, a few years ago a lady and a gentleman came to Washington, and they lobbied through an appropriation for the purchase of 640 acres of land in Sonoma County for a reservation for some Indians up in that part of the country. Well, I own a ranch up there—no; I did not sell the ranch to them—and those Indians were pretty well civilized and were getting along very well. They were taking care of themselves, working around on ranches and in the woods, and making a living and saving money; some raising horses, cattle, and chickens, and their children were sent to the district school. But that did not satisfy these people. They wanted to put them on a reservation, and they bought the land for the reservation from a man by the name of Nobles, a quarter-breed Indian. Now, those Indians had a little place of their own, a rancheree. On one end of the reservation lives an Indian by the name of Haupt, who owns 700 or 800 acres, and another by the name of Hayden and several other land-owning Indians live in the neighborhood and a couple of Norwegians.

I own 700 or 800 acres. Those Indians used to live around there and had a little place of their own and were making money, and the Lord knows what they do now except they are being kept on the reservation. Now, that is civilizing them to the queen's taste, I do not think. This $43,000, I think, is for a proper purpose, although I do not think you have gone sufficiently into details of what it is for or where it is to be used. There are a number of Indians scattered all over California and a number of Indian reservations, and there are several Indian schools, and they are doing very well. As far as this $43,000 is concerned, I do not know exactly where it is to be used.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY of California. I yield.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to say to the gentleman that the justification for this item is in considerable detail.

Mr. CURRY of California. Then the gentleman who had the information ought to have given it.

Mr. SNYDER. It is here in the hearings.

Mr. CURRY of California. We all do not get the hearings.

Mr. SNYDER. But the gentleman can get them.

Mr. CURRY of California. Some of them sometimes we can. I have no doubt that the money ought to be appropriated the same as in other places—Oklahoma, Arizona, North and South Dakota, and so forth.

There are lots of uncivilized Indians being civilized, as I said before, and there are some civilized Indians being uncivilized. I say that the best thing the United States can do, and at as early a date as possible, is to give the Indians their allotments, turn them loose, and make free men and women of them, and let them take care of themselves. They can do it as well as we can care for them if we only give them a chance.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to state to the gentleman from California that he describes a very happy condition of Indians, when a few uplifters went in among them, found them working for their neighbors and making a living for themselves and their children, and were sending their children to the schools——

Mr. CURRY of California. And saving money.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And saving money. This $42,000 is to pay the white men and women who are upon the agencies where these Indians are now assembled and are being decitizenized and unfitted for civilization and self-sustenance. That is the purpose of this appropriation, as it is on practically every other reservation scattered throughout the country.

Mr. CURRY of California. That is what I thought.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is for the pay of the salaries of the white officers who are there and trying to hold the Indians together and keep them out of civilization.

Mr. CURRY of California. That is what I thought. I thought I would get that explanation soon. But until you repeal the other acts you will have to appropriate this money, because you have prevented the Indians from making the living they were making before they were put on the reservations.

Mr. GARD. Not that I desire to pose as an obstructionist, because I confess I know very little about the matter stated in this Indian bill, I wish to say that as the disclosures made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] seem to indicate that in these matters, under the head of support and civilization of Indians, not alone in California but much more in the States of Arizona and New Mexico, where $330,000 is evidently given in large proportion to those who inflict themselves on the body politic to keep the Indians out of civilization, I am constrained to make a point of order to the paragraph.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. GARD. And not so much as it affects California, because I do not desire to do that. There should be some light of publicity, which this committee has not given and which this committee as a whole does not understand, which the House of Representatives does not know about all these things that are carried under cover here—large amounts of money of which we know absolutely nothing. I confess my entire ignorance, and I presume I am of the average of the House.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. This is not a California matter, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CURRY of California. Will you reserve that point of order for a moment?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the chairman of the committee first, and then I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not insist on that point of order. It is not a California item. If there are any Indians in the United States that are entitled to consideration at the hands of this Government they are the Indians of the State of California. They owned largely the entire State several generations ago, and since that time they have been deprived of their patrimony by citizens of the United States who have moved into that country.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield to me just a moment?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. GARD. The patrimony, as disclosed by that which was read from the hearings by the gentleman from Kansas, was not patrimony of the Indian, but the patrimony of the white men and Indian agents.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit me a few moments, I think I can explain that.

These Indians went along in California—and they are the poorest Indians in the United States—until they had absolutely nothing left. And then the Government undertook to buy little tracts of land for them and to take care of them. That has been going on now ever since I came to Congress. Some of them are getting a few acres of land. One hundred and seventeen years ago, I think it was, perhaps, this Government embarked upon an Indian policy of supervising the affairs of the different Indians throughout the country in various ways; first, in taking care of his property and seeing that his white neighbor did not cheat him out of it; second, in educating the Indian, and in a great many other ways that I could explain to the gentleman if I had the time. Those appropriations were carried in this bill under the head of support and civilization. Several years afterwards the Indian Bureau was taken out from under the War Department and placed under the Department of the Interior, and those items have continuously since that time been carried as support and civilization of the Indian, not that the money was given to the Indian to buy land or anything else. And really, if the gentleman wants to know the truth about it, I do not think that is a good thing. I think it is a better thing to give the money to the white man to teach the Indian to protect his property than it is to deliver to that Indian some meal or flour or other ration that will make him absolutely dependent upon the white man for his subsistence. I think it is the duty o the white man to teach the Indian, the duty of this Government to teach the Indian, to be self-sustaining.

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And he can never be taught to be self-sustaining if we rely upon the old policy of distributing rations, and that is what my friend from Kansas seems to indicate that these appropriations are made for. Now, they are not made for that purpose.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon another question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARD. It seems to me from the reading here that out of this total of $42,000 only about $3,000 worth of support and civilization actually reached the Indians, and the rest of it was halted on "the Great White Way."

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is in error about that. For instance, practically the whole appropriation is intended to go, and does go, for a good purpose for the Indians.

Mr. GARD. I am in entire sympathy with the remarks made by the gentleman's colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], who seems to have a very excellent grasp on what should be done in this matter of essential administration.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There is no difference between my colleague from Oklahoma and myself on that proposition.

Mr. GARD. I trust not.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And I shall be very glad to have the help of the gentleman from Ohio at any time in the work of decentralizing the Indian Bureau. But what does the gentleman's point of order do? It simply cuts off from these poor Indians in California, who are good Indians, any assistance or help that they might receive in the next year.

Mr. GARD. I am asking entirely for personal information. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Surely.

Mr. GARD. Does the same proportion of salaries and pay of employees apply in the item of $330,000, on page 18, for Arizona and New Mexico?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I doubt not. That is what it is intended for. It has never been the policy of the Federal Government for the last 15 or 20 years to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury to be divided among the Indians. The policy of the Government has been to appropriate money to try to educate the Indian and place upon him a personal responsibility. That can not be done by issuing rations.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman agree with his colleague from Oklahoma that we have gone too far in that direction?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes. I think some of our agencies are too highly organized, and I think they have always been too highly organized, and until Congress takes a strong stand and decentralizes that organization it will not be done.

Mr. HASTINGS. That takes legislation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes. It takes legislation to decentralize them.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CURRY of California. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not make the point of order against this item. It would not be fair. The gentleman is a fair man. These Indians are now on these reservations, and they have got to have supervision. I will agree with the gentleman that if he will introduce a bill to decentralize this system and give the Indians a chance to take care of themselves I will give him what aid I can; but when we have legislated them away from independence and placed them on a reservation it would not be fair to prevent the appropriation of an amount of money sufficient for them to be properly supervised.

Mr. GARD. I do not seek to prevent any appropriation if it will do any good. The thing I am trying to get at is to arrive at some method by which this decentralization may be accomplished.

Mr. CURRY of California. That can not be done after you have enacted legislation and put the Indians on the reservation by stopping the appropriation to supervise them.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman's point of order, if the gentleman will permit, does not look toward decentralization, but rather looks toward further centralization, because if the point of order is sustained and this item is taken out of the bill, no money can be expended at that agency whatever, but the Indian Bureau can still send its inspectors there from the bureau and send them back and forth, and therefore the Government will be more centralized than it was before.

Mr. GARD. I suspect that if the appropriation were withdrawn there would not be so many at the agency.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They would send inspectors out there, and it would involve a large traveling expense.

Mr. GARD. Then the gentleman thinks that the point of order should not be insisted on?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman will leave a lot of poor Indians and a lot of slack and rusty old Indians out there with nothing to lean on if he would insist on his point of order. That would be the result.

Mr. GARD. I am very glad to follow the advice of the chairman of the committee, and I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase of lands for the homeless Indians in California, including improvements thereon, for the use and occupancy of said Indians, $20,000, said funds to be expended under such regulations and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I propose to amend this paragraph by striking out, on page 23, line 19, the figures "$20,000" and inserting "$5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ELLSWORTH: Page 23, line 19, strike out "$20,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, $20,000 was the amount carried in the last appropriation bill for this purpose. Mr. Meritt, the assistant commissioner, stated that he believed that the entire amount of the estimate would be needed for the purchase of the land for homeless Indians in California for the fiscal year 1920. Last year, or for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, there was expended $250.80.

Mr. LITTLE. For land?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. There was expended out of this item $250.80. An analysis of the expenditure shows that of $250.80 the sum of $200 was invested in land for homeless Indians in California, and the expense of investing $200 for land for homeless Indians was, traveling expenses, $43.90, or about one-fifth of what the land itself cost, and $6.90 miscellaneous. Now, in a community such as most of us live in, and under the existing conditions outside of the Indian Bureau of the United States, and in almost any other governmental sphere excepting the Indian Bureau, I do not believe it would take over $50 to purchase $200 worth of land for homeless Indians. It seems to me that there ought to be some way by which the Government could purchase a lot—I presume this was a lot—for a homeless Indian to build a shack on in which to live without having to expend more than one-fourth of what the land itself cost for expenses. If, finally, we do get land for all these 2,700 Indians of this tribe in California who expect to be furnished homes by this Government some day, at $300 apiece the land will cost $810,000, and at the same ratio it will cost about $200,000 for expenses in purchasing the land. It seems to me this item ought to be reduced. It was not spent last year. There is nothing that I can see to show that there will be any more expended in any more judicious way in the future than it has been in the past.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the amendment the gentleman from Minnesota offers will not prevail. True, the Indian Office did not expend hardly any money out of this appropriation last year. It is also true that we were at war, and that conditions were such that they could not make the progress that should have been made in the purchase of land for these poor and homeless Indians. That is the information given me by the Indian Office.

Mr. George Wharton James, of Pasadena, Cal., whose interesting books about the Mission and other Indians many of you have read, called on me a few days ago and inquired about this particular appropriation. Mr. James urged the importance of finishing up the work of supplying lands to the homeless Indians of California. He told me that a number of friends of the Indians in that State, among them Dr. David Starr Jordan, of Stanford University, intended to tender their services to the Indian Office to see that this work was promptly completed so that the Indians could soon be placed on land where they might live in some sort of comfort. The Indian Office states in the hearings that there remain about 2,700 Indians in California for whom land should be purchased. With this amount and the sum that is available in the unexpended balance it ought to be possible to take care of a considerable number of them in the course of the next fiscal year. I am sure that Mr. James and his associates in California will be glad to assist the Indian Office so that this money may be expended in a way that will confer the largest possible benefit to the Indians. Such being the case, we ought to make this appropriation of $20,000, thereby carrying out a policy that Congress adopted some years ago.

Mr. GARD. I notice that $10,000 is the sum estimated, whereas $20,000 was the sum asked for.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Indian Office asked for a reappropriation of the unexpended balance of $20,000, which, with the $10,000 mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio, would amount altogether to about $30,000. Instead of that we appropriated $20,000, which is in truth a cut under the estimates of $10,000.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have heard a great many gentlemen on this floor criticize the expenditures because they were lavish, but this is the first time I ever heard an administration officer criticized for not spending the money. Does the gentleman from Minnesota think that this $47 was devoted wholly to the purchase of the $250 worth of land? Probably some of it was expended for inspection of other tracts which were not purchased, in the interest of economy, and that the Government saved money by the expenditure of this $47.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. The amount was $200 worth of land and not $250, and the travel and miscellaneous expenses amounted to $50.

Mr. RANDALL. But the $50 probably was not devoted entirely to the purchase of this land but in the inspection of other tracts which might have been purchased if they had been perfectly satisfactory in price.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It seems to me that when an amount of money is appropriated for expenses in the purchase of land, if an official gives testimony before a committee of Congress he should be intelligent enough, if his expense was for something else than the purchase of the land, to so state.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman will understand that probably the inspection of other tracts was involved in this expenditure. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For reclamation and maintenance charge on Yuma allotments, $131,564.94, to be reimbursed from the sale of surplus lands or from other funds that may be available, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. L., 1063).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have looked at the hearings on this item and find that this is to repay the Reclamation Service this amount. It is quite common for the Reclamation Service to take over reclamation projects on Indian reservations, develop them, have them charged against the Indian Service, and then later paid for their aliquot share?

Mr. HAYDEN. Wherever Indian lands are included within reclamation projects arrangements are made for the irrigation of those lands along with the lands of the white people. As it happens, the Laguna Dam on the Colorado River is located just above this reservation. The main canal passes through the Yuma Reservation, and then the water goes by syphon under the Colorado River, where it is used to irrigate other lands in Arizona, making up the greater part of the project. The cost to the Indian is just the same per acre as that of the white man. The reclamation project is complete, and the amounts due from the white people are being collected. This appropriation is for the purpose of paying the Indian's share in the same ratio as the white people pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the hearings I notice that the Reclamation Service asked that the amount charged against the Indian lands be paid in a certain length of time. Heretofore the Bureau of Indian Affairs has not provided similar payments, the appropriation last year being $10,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Fifteen thousand dollars, but that was for operation and maintenance, while this appropriation is to pay the cost of construction.

Mr. STAFFORD. And at the end of 10 years the Indians will be relieved of all liability to the Reclamation Service, and whenever the land is sold it will be sold free from any charges to the Reclamation Service.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; and this is the same charge that the white man pays.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

FLORIDA.

SEC. 4. For relief of distress among the Seminole Indians in Florida, and for purposes of their civilization and education, $20,000, including the construction and equipment of necessary buildings.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Last year there was a limitation on the appropriation that this expenditure for the building of the Seminole Indians in Florida should be on lands set aside for their use by the State. Why has not that authorization been carried in this bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. Since the last appropriation bill the State of Florida has given to the Seminole Indians 100,000 acres of land and the Government has given them 25,000 acres of land. It is proposed to make whatever improvements are made upon the land belonging to the Seminoles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the authorities of Kansas City, Kans., the sum of $1,000 in consideration of the agreement of said authorities forever to maintain and care for the Huron Cemetery, a tract of land in the city of Kansas City, Kans., owned by the Government of the United States, the use of which was conveyed by treaty to the Wyandotte Tribe of Indians as a cemetery for members of said tribe, such payment to be made from the $10,000 appropriated for the preservation and improvement of said cemetery by the act of September 8, 1916 (39 Stat. L., 844).

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve all points of order. I will ask the chairman concerning this item to let it go over until to-morrow. The bill does not quite agree with the suggestions of Mr. Meritt, the assistant commissioner, before the committee. I think the language means the same, but it does not quite agree, and I took it up with him over the phone. He promised to look it up, and I have wired the city commissioners and the mayor. It is just a question of the language, and I wish that the committee would let the matter go over until in the morning.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to passing this item over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that this item be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

MINNESOTA.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent that all of the items relating to the Indians in Minnesota be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Minnesota items be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISSISSIPPI.

SEC. 9. That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $75,000 for the full-blood Choctaw Indians of Mississippi in the Indian appropriation act of May 25, 1918, is hereby reappropriated for the same purposes for which originally appropriated and for aiding the common schools attended by the children of said Indians under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph go over until to-morrow, when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this paragraph be passed over until the next sitting of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the Indian appropriation act of March 1, 1907 (34 Stats. L., pp. 1015 and 1035), as relates to the disposal of surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation in Montana is hereby repealed, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make allotments under existing laws within the said reservation to any Indians of said Blackfeet Tribe not heretofore allotted, living six months after the approval of this act, and thereafter to prorate all unallotted and otherwise unreserved lands therein among the Indians who have been allotted or may be entitled to rights within said reservation: Provided, That of the lands so allotted 80 acres of each allotment shall be designated as a homestead by the allottee and be evidenced by a trust patent and shall remain inalienable until Congress shall otherwise direct: Provided further, That the Blackfeet tribal rolls shall close as of six months after the approval of this act, and thereafter no additional names shall be added to said rolls: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to repeal the grants of land made by the act of March 1, 1907, to religious institutions and to the State of Montana for school purposes, nor repeal the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of any land within said reservation suitable for town-site purposes, as provided by that act: Provided, That the State of Montana in making indemnity school selections shall be confined to nonmineral and nonirrigable lands: Provided further, That the provisions of the act of March 4, 1907, which require a division of the funds received from the sale of the surplus lands immediately upon the date of the approval of the allotments of land are hereby repealed: Provided, That the lands within said reservation, whether allotted, unallotted, reserved, set aside for town-site purposes, granted to the State of Montana for school purposes, or otherwise disposed of, shall be subject to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country until otherwise provided by Congress: Provided, That the lands may be leased by the allottee for mineral purposes, under such rules and regulations and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided further, That allotments herein provided for shall be made under such rules and regulations as the said secretary may prescribe, and trust patents shall be issued therefor as provided by the aforesaid act of March 1, 1907, except as to the homestead hereinbefore mentioned.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on this paragraph. I think some very full explanation should be made of the reason for this legislation providing virtually for reallotment of the unallotted lands of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that this legislation is inserted at the suggestion of the Indian Office and at the request of the Indians on the reservation. As the law now stands provision is made for the disposition of the surplus lands on this reservation after each Indian has received a certain allotment. The Indians say that this is preeminently a stock-raising country, and that the lands are not suitable for agriculture. The Indian Office encourages them in that opinion. That being the case, the Indians would be better satisfied and better off if they were given larger allotments of this land, if it was divided among them, rather than having the surplus land sold to white people. This legislation repeals the present law, which authorizes the sale of the surplus lands, and provides for a reallotment of such lands among the Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the total area of the unallotted land to which this section applies?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is enough to give about 450 acres to each Indian.

Mr. STAFFORD. Some of the land has already been allotted to some of the Indians?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. This legislation provides for a new tribal roll, as of date six months after the passage of this act. It would make that the final roll, and then the Indian Office would proceed with allotments from that roll to wind up the affairs of these Indians so far as their land is concerned; that is, dividing up and passing title to all of the land among all of the Indians.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice that as to some of the lands that will be allotted it is merely the homestead of 80 acres which is to be inalienable.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is in accordance with the policy of the department on other reservations, for the department will not permit an Indian to dispose of his homestead. He might dispose of his surplus lands if he is competent to do so. That policy is followed so that an allotted Indian will never be without a home.

Mr. STAFFORD. As soon as these lands are allotted and the title has been confirmed in the Indian, he is privileged to sell the lands other than the 80-acre tract?

Mr. HAYDEN. If he gets the approval of the Indian Office. Being an incompetent Indian, as most of the Blackfeet are, he would have first to get permission to sell from the Indian Office.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are most of these Indians incompetents?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. What are they now engaged in for a living?

Mr. HAYDEN. Stock raising, as a rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Have they much funds to their credit in the Treasury?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is a statement in the hearings which gives the amount of funds in the Treasury to the credit of the Blackfeet Tribe. Apparently they have on hand $45,544 and estimated receipts for next year $48,000, making a total income of $95,000. I presume that comes from the lease of their grazing lands. I do not know where else it would come from.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman acquainted as to whether any of this land is mineral land?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I desire to call attention to the statement just made in regard to these Indians having on hand $47,000, or something like that, but that does not include all of it. You will notice lower down that they have something like $254,000 a year of interest at 4 per cent on their invested funds, so they undoubtedly have several million dollars.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much land up to the present time has been allotted to these Indians?

Mr. HAYDEN. I think each Indian heretofore was allotted a half section of land, or 320 acres, and this legislation would increase the full allotment to 450 acres to the individual Indian.

Mr. STAFFORD. Including the 320 he heretofore received?

Mr. HAYDEN. The full allotment would approximate about 450 acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. This land is grazing land?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, reverting to the inquiry as to whether there is any mineral land, I notice that the provision authorizes the allottee to lease the land for mineral purposes subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Has the gentleman any information that there are any mineral deposits in this reservation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I brought that matter out in the hearings. I was informed some time before that that there was a little production of oil 50 or 70 miles north of that, and I asked Assistant Commissioner Meritt if there were any minerals underlying that land. He stated none that he knew of, and this provision was put in there on my suggestion that there was a possibility of oil production in the future. Even if they should drill up near the line of allotment it is necessary for the Indian to come here and secure legislation, and he might be very materially damaged; therefore, I thought it best to have a provision of this character in there so as to take care of any possible future need.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important item. Still the gentleman has furnished information which I believe shows it is in the interest of the Indian.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman from North Dakota, who lives in that section of the country, can possibly give the gentleman some more information.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the character of this land? Are there any mineral deposits in it?

Mr. GANDY. No; not to my knowledge, there are not any minerals developed, oil, gas, or anything of that kind.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It has just a little coal.

Mr. GANDY. At some places there is a little lignite coal.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman believes it is for the best interest of the Indians to grant them the larger unit of allotment?

Mr. GANDY. Well, I confess I have had some doubts in my mind on that, but it is their own land.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For road and bridge construction on the Mescalero Indian Reservation, in New Mexico, including the purchase of material, equipment, and supplies; the employment of labor; and the cost of surveys, plans, and estimates, if necessary, $25,000, to be immediately available and to be reimbursed from any funds of the Indians of said reservation now or hereafter on deposit in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That Indian labor shall be employed as far as practicable.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. Is this the same road that was authorized in the last year's appropriation act in which the State or other agency was to contribute one-half of the cost?

Mr. WALTON. No, sir. The road extends from the railroad station at Tularosa to a short distance within the reservation lines. It is entirely a separate proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is within the reservation?

Mr. WALTON. It is within the reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw my reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. For support and education of 160 Indian pupils at the Indian school at Cherokee, N. C., including pay of superintendent, $37,800; for general repairs and improvements, $6,000; in all, $43,800.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. As I understand that, last year we appropriated for 200 pupils down there and this year for 160.

Mr. HAYDEN. The record shows that the capacity of the school was but 160 pupils, and the average attendance was only 151.

Mr. FOSTER. You had too much last year, and so this year you raised the amount but lessen the number to be educated; is that it?

Mr. HAYDEN. The committee allowed an increase this year in the per capita amount for the maintenance of nearly all of the Indian schools, but in some cases we reduced the number of pupils to correspond to about the average attendance or the capacity of the school.

Mr. FOSTER. You this year appropriate for just half the number you did last year, and you have raised the appropriations from $33,600 to $37,800 and from $39,600 to $43,000. Then I suppose in the proportion that the number of pupils decreases the appropriation increases?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Indian Office estimated for $46,800 for that school, and, including the repairs and improvements, asked for a total of $52,800. The committee cut the estimate $9,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I was just curious to know how you arrived at 50 per cent less pupils.

Mr. HAYDEN. Not 50 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. You appropriated last year——

Mr. HAYDEN. For 200 pupils and this year for 160, a reduction of 40 pupils.

Mr. FOSTER. I wondered as the Indian pupils decreased why the appropriations increased.

Mr. HAYDEN. The committee decreased the number of pupils but increased the per capita cost.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I wanted to know.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That not exceeding $5,000 of the amount reappropriated by the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year 1919 (40 Stat L., p. 577) for employees' quarters may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be used for the purchase of the Baker cottage and grounds adjoining the Indian school grounds.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, the Indian appropriation act referred to in this paragraph appropriated $10,000 for the erection of a building that, I believe, was to be used as employees' quarters. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], who is a member of the committee——

Mr. FOSTER. How many employees are there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Dakota make a point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. I made the point of order, but I reserve it for a moment.

Mr. GANDY. I am unable to give the gentleman offhand the number of employees. The number appears in the hearings. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] stated that this cottage is really in what used to be a part of the Indian grounds. It was sold at one time, and, in his judgment, the home of Capt. Baker could be purchased for $5,000; that it was amply large to meet the requirements of the school; that it is right at the edge of the Indian grounds; and that as heretofore there was $10,000 appropriated for the building. If they could purchase this for $5,000, they could save $5,000 of the former appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. Save $5,000?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] was of the opinion the Government could save money by buying this house that adjoins the school, rather than putting up a new building. That is the whole purpose of the appropriation.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. I will say that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON], after careful questioning on the part of the committee, without a stenographer in attendance, said to those present that this was the wise thing to do. The building is badly needed at the present time, and the amount seemed to be a satisfactory amount to cover the building that he proposed to have the department buy.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it just a building there?

Mr. SNYDER. It is a building right adjacent to the school grounds.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is this man Baker?

Mr. SNYDER. He is a man that lives up there in that country.

Mr. FOSTER. Has he been connected with Indian Affairs?

Mr. SNYDER. He does not want to sell his property especially, and we have no request from the Indian Bureau to buy it from him. It is simply a suggestion on the part of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. FOSTER. How much land has he?

Mr. SNYDER. This is right within the reservation—on the property.

Mr. FOSTER. He has some land?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; he has some land. It is not of much account.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] said there were 30 acres of land.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The hearings show that there are 13 employees. The amount, which I understand is $5,000, is to be appropriated for the purchase of this cottage or house.

If the gentleman will permit further, I will say to him that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] seemed to think that this was the proper thing to do, and I have always found it fairly safe to follow a Member of Congress about a matter of that kind, because he usually has more information on the proposition in his own State than others may have.

Mr. FOSTER. Sometimes they are a little enthusiastic.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman will admit that $5,000 for 13 employees is not excessive.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman from North Dakota was personally familiar with the proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. I wondered if there was a house there that this man was living in that would supply quarters for 13 people—an ordinary family residence.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from North Dakota said he personally visited and inspected this property, and he thought it was ample.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. No. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $676, to reimburse Benson County, N. Dak., for money actually paid by said county to the State of North Dakota for care of three insane Indians, Mary Josephine Pejihutaskana, Alfred Littlewind, and Joseph Langer, in the North Dakota State Insane Asylum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved on the last paragraph read. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GOODALL, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. PETERS), was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—PANAMA CANAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered printed and, with the accompanying document, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the annual report of the Governor of the Panama Canal for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1918.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 23, 1919.

LIGNITE COAL.

Mr. FOSTER, by direction of the Committee on Mines and Mining, submitted for printing under the rule the conference report and accompanying statement on the bill (S. 3220) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make investigation, through the Bureau of Mines, of lignite coals and peat to determine the practicability of their utilization as a fuel and in producing commercial products.

THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY—CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 971).

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on H. R. 12001, to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, for printing under the rule.

The conference report and statement of the House conferees are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R.

12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 3. That the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of district courts of the United States, and such salaries shall be paid as now provided by law. The judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia shall receive salaries the same as the salaries provided by this act to be paid to judges of the circuit court of appeals of the United States, and such salaries shall be paid as now provided by law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 5. That the judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals shall receive salaries equal in amount to the salaries provided by this act to be paid judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, payable monthly from the Treasury."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12001) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

Amendments Nos. 1, 3, 6, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, on which the House recedes, only change the mode of expression used in the bill and do not make a substantive change in the bill as it passed the House.

Amendments Nos. 5, 9, and 15, on which the House recedes, change the number of sections. This was made necessary by the added sections inserted by the Senate.

Amendment No. 2, on which the House recedes, adds the judges exercising Federal jurisdiction in Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Alaska, and increases their salary to $7,500 a year.

Amendment No. 4, on which the House recedes with an amendment, inserts a new section to the bill making provision for increasing salaries of judges in the District of Columbia. This amendment increases the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to $7,500 a year, which is the same salary provided in the bill for the Federal district judges. This salary, it is provided, shall be paid as now provided by law, which means that half of it is to be paid by the District of Columbia and the other half out of the Treasury of the United States.

This amendment also increases the salaries of the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia up to the salaries provided by the bill to be paid to the judges of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, which is $8,500 a year to each judge.

The amendment added by the conferees provides that the salaries provided for, to be paid the judges of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, shall be paid as now provided by law. The effect of this amendment is to require half of these salaries to be paid by the District of Columbia and the other half by the Treasury of the United States.

Amendment No. 7: The Senate recedes on this amendment, which provided that the judges of the Court of Claims should receive the same salaries as judges of the Circuit Courts of Appeals of the United States, or $8,500 per annum.

As it relates to these salaries the bill is left as it originally passed the House, which provides that the salary of the chief justice of the Court of Claims shall receive a salary of $8,000 per annum, and that the other judges of this court shall receive salaries of $7,500 each per annum.

Amendment No. 8, on which the House recedes with an amendment, inserts a new section to the bill increasing the salaries of the judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals to $8,500 per year. The amendment agreed to, to this amendment, in conference, does not change the intent of the original Senate amendment, but was made necessary by the Senate having receded on amendment No. 7.

A bill (S. 5429) granting an increase of pension to Mary Leahy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 5430) to increase the cost of the public building at Marianna, Fla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 5431) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to each of the cities of Pasadena, Willows, Chico, Redlands, and San Jose, in the State of California, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KIRBY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GAY submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salaries of officers and employees of the Subtreasuries of the country, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the standardization and design of sugar-testing apparatus, etc., from $20,000 to $30,000, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SWANSON submitted an amendment proposing to amend the act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes, approved July 11, 1916, so as to provide that the term "rural post roads," as used in section 2 of that act, shall be construed to mean any public road which is now used or may be made suitable for the transportation of the United States mails, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Illinois kindly yield to me, as I have to go to a conference committee meeting on the revenue bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to have the Secretary read an extract from the inaugural address of the governor of Pennsylvania, made on last Tuesday, in connection with the serious financial problem presented by Federal taxation, and by the apparently endless propositions to appropriate and squander money for chimerical projects. It is not very long, but coming as it does from the recently elected governor of the State, taking office last Tuesday, a State which paid one-sixth of the Federal taxes last year and which will pay nearly $1,000,000,000 of taxation under the pending revenue bill, I think it may be of interest to the Senate. It is not long, and I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

Mr. PENROSE. It has some relation to the pending measure and therefore is not entirely irrelevant to the discussions which have been going on in the Senate.

The SECRETARY (reading from the Philadelphia Inquirer of Wednesday morning, January 22, 1919)—

Before we are able to plan very effectively for our work during the next four years we must give direct attention to the question of revenue. We shall have to face demands for increased appropriations due to the higher cost of maintaining our public institutions, in providing for the improvement of our schools and decent salaries for our teachers, for public works to assist in meeting the problem of unemployment, and for the extension of the State's aid for those maimed in battle and in our industries. While we may be able to prevent waste and extravagance by simplifying and coordinating the departments of our government, and may see to it that we shall receive full value for the money which we expend, we can not in the present aspect of things, and in view of the necessity of progressive development of the public enterprises, attempt much in the way of retrenchment.

The Federal taxgatherer is encroaching so deeply into the fields hitherto reserved for State revenues that the question of funds for State purposes is becoming a serious one. Few people realize the stupendous charge which has been imposed upon us by the plan of taxation which the officials at Washington have devised. Pennsylvania is paying about one-sixth of the entire cost of the administration of the United States Government. Last year this State contributed in Federal taxes almost $600,000,000. This year, if the bill now before Congress shall become a law, as now seems probable, the Federal levy upon Pennsylvania will be approximately $1,000,000,000. The vastness of this sum and the way in which it bears upon us may be better realized by a contemplation of the fact that the sum which the Federal Government proposes to collect from the people of Pennsylvania in taxes this year is almost equal to the aggregate amount raised by this Commonwealth for State purposes in all of the 128 years which have elapsed since the State government was organized.

The State revenues for this year will just about equal the interest at 4½ per cent upon the amount which we must pay to the United States. These figures are startling and they are of value in showing how important Pennsylvania is in this Nation and how modest have been the demands of the Commonwealth upon her own people.

Pennsylvania does not complain under the burdens which she is bearing. She has cheerfully stood by with her men and her money in the national emergency, and she is proud to again have the disposition and the substance to render such notable service to the Republic and to the world. But with our share so large in our national undertakings we may be pardoned a care that our funds contributed without stint to the Federal purse should not be wasted in incompetent administration nor scattered over the world in chimerical enterprises without practical purpose. Our people are loyal, generous, and progressive and have ever given liberally of their means in real philanthropy. They are possessed, too, of much of that very desirable quality known as soundness of mind or hard sense. They realize that real sacrifices must be made to pay the great debts we have incurred in saving civilization and democracy, but they feel that some plans must be devised for discharging these debts and providing for our own reconstruction and readjustment before we embark upon new international adventures in the uncharted seas of idealism and which may bring down upon our devoted ship of state the burdens of all mankind. Let us put our own house in reasonably good order before venturing too far in regulating the rest of the world.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, on the 22d day of February we shall reenact that now melancholy farce known as the reading of Washington's Farewell Address. I hope that the Senator from Minnesota will be present. I hope, too, that all the honorable Senators will be present, in order that they may understand how far we have traveled from the way there outlined and how rapid has been our gait. The days of Spartan simplicity have departed, never to return.

The Senator says he will trust to the personnel of this commission, being gentlemen of high character, giving their names—Lord Reading, of England; a citizen of France who was a minister of France, whose name I will not undertake to recall——

Mr. KING. Clementel.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the Senator from Utah for his timely suggestion—and a distinguished public official of Italy—that they will, with Mr. Hoover, administer this fund. I am satisfied with the character of these gentlemen. That is not the reason, Mr. President, that I will oppose the bill; I know that Hoover is not Hoover, and while it may be the voice of one it will be the hand of another.

Hoover, in the administration of food supplies in this country, was in authority because the chief was too busy elsewhere to interfere with his operations. It must be remembered, however, that this $100,000,000 is not a food relief fund. It is a campaign fund for the President as a candidate for chairman of the Peace League of the World. Strip off this insolent pretense that covers this appropriation; tell the truth about it once in a while, if you must shame his satanic majesty in doing so. Mr. President, I am tired unto death of the sickening pretenses with which Senators condole and satisfy themselves in this Chamber. That is the reason why I hope all of them will be present when Washington's Farewell Address is read. It will be a time, certainly, for sober reflection.

Entangling alliances to be avoided? A hundred million dollars is the first tribute we pay to a departure from this advice; how much more nobody knows. It is one continual round of appropriations, not only since the war began but before we declared a state of war in April, 1917. As some irreverent wit said, he was willing to pay a war tax if there was any war. We were paying it before 1917 in increased taxes, in appropriations that were galloping into hundreds and thousands of millions. Nobody called a halt then. It is always popular to spend money in Washington. The press congratulates everybody who votes for an appropriation. It is one continuous procession for the distinguished citizens living in Washington to get their elbows into the Public Treasury. They are clamoring for the right of suffrage in Washington. They now have all that they are entitled to in Washington. It is a city of jobholders engineered by those who are adepts in the art of taxation. That, with the colored contingent, constitutes the whole city of Washington. What a noble constituency for a State! A population engaged in the ancient and honorable profession of irrigating the principal pursuits by diverting revenue from the Treasury. It lives on taxes. Enable it to turn on the power that sustains it! A lovely place it is, indeed, to be the Capital of a hundred millions of people—the place where the profiteer by day and by night knows no ceasing, and, like the thieves that steal and the moths that eat away, the destrucive forces are always active. If endowed with membership in Congress, they would have but one duty—increase the pay roll and clamor for more.

It may be that some of us will lay up our treasure in heaven, but no living mortal man lays it up in Washington. Col. House in his book says the preachers have made a mistake always in saying that this world was only a place for penitence and mortification of the flesh; that it was wrong to teach that there was a better world than this. His doctrine was to make this the best place to stay, so that nobody would ever want to die, or hope, if he did, to go anywhere else.

I earnestly hope there is a better place when we leave this world than Washington.

Save the suffering poor of Europe? What about the starving poor in Washington and elsewhere? This is a place where it is a mad riot of grocers; where the market, which is supposed to be a place where supplies can be purchased at a reasonable price, is but a den of thieves; and I wish the Savior would return to earth and scourge them out of the temple of decent living and respectable prices. It will not be done. We will go on piling up protest after protest. It accomplishes nothing. It hurts nobody for us to talk. We have got to the point where everybody regards Congress with open and undisguised contempt.

Here is a cable dispatch from Europe, on the strength of which Senators in tumultuous and offensive haste fall over each other to announce their support of it. There is no use for the President to be at home. He can vote us much better abroad, because it possesses novelty. We have, too, in cities like Chicago and New York many European voters. The Poles vote and the Serbians vote and the Germans vote and the Italians vote. We hear of the Slovak and the Bohemian vote. But we have now the long-distance wireless or cable vote to order or direct Senators what to do. Of course, it is strictly modern. It is no concern to anybody what the laws as enacted by Congress might be. The more laws we make the more violations that occur and the more open and flagrant contempt is manifested for the lawmaking department. It simply furnishes a convenient excuse to express itself, and it does at divers intervals.

We go on talking, and the country says, "Yes; Congress is killing time. Listen to them talk." At what time do they come to us in earnest? Only when they want money, appropriations, tax levies. We have not yet quite reached the point in this country where the Executive levies taxes without the formality of submitting such measures to Congress and telling them in advance how he wants them levied and on appropriations how much he wants appropriated. It would be unpopular for the Executive to levy taxes. We still nominally are an English-speaking race, with the English-speaking prejudices and impulses, opposed to the Executive or monarch levying taxes. One English king went into exile for trying it and another lost his head. It has been unpopular since that time, because the average executive likes to keep his crown and his head as long as he is on earth. So those old prejudiced, reactionary methods of getting money from taxpayers are still obstacles in the way of a progressive executive.

Therefore, the Executive, Mr. President, is bound to come to Congress to get money. That is the only time we are of any importance. It is when the administration or some foreign applicant needs money. So we go on talking. Talk is futile.

We understand that. Whenever Executive directions are given, we know what will happen in this Congress. Nobody knows what will happen in the next, not even Republicans. That is beyond the ken of mortals, and possibly of Omniscience. At any rate, it is generally recognized that we just talk, and so I am talking this afternoon. I have something to say, but I do not know whether it will interest anybody or not. It does not particularly interfere with me if the majority side wish to go to their offices, or any of the minority. I am used to talking to the official shorthand reporters of the Senate. We have had many entertaining times in the last five or six years. It is customary in this Chamber. We can continue.

It is amazing to see how little of anything new there is in the world. Juvenal described the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD nearly 1900 years ago:

> Lo! there expanded the nine hundredth page,
> And still new themes, to toils renewed engage;
> Facts upon facts still force him to enlarge,
> And reams of costly paper swell the charge!

No wonder the Federal Trade Commission wanted the price of news print cut down. It is an old problem.

But they say the men who administer this $100,000,000 fund that we are about to appropriate are all competent. So are they all, all honorable men. An orator of antiquity in the Roman market place, after a celebrated assassination, said "they are all, all honorable men." Certainly.

What will they do with the money? Spend it for the needy ones in Europe. Here is the eastern flour situation at home, not from any imaginary source but from the cold-blooded reports of the market.

EASTERN FLOUR SITUATION.

Brainard, New York, in message to F. S. Lewis says: "Flour men say release of terminal wheat will not result in any buying of wheat, as it is impossible to sell flour. East is packed and jammed with all kinds of flour and absolutely no demand. Resellers here offering 75 cents to a dollar a barrel under mill prices. Food Administration flour department bought nothing for three weeks. Two large flour jobbers in New York failed this week."

And you did not get the snap of a finger any place around in the way of information from any official source.

Flour trade have taken big losses on flour substitutes.

Little sympathy can be expected. When we had to buy 25 pounds of substitute for every 25 pounds of flour they got even with the purchaser. When we bought rice, rye, barley, corn, hominy meal, anything in the line of cereals, what they lost on the flour they very promptly recovered on the substitutes. If anybody must lose anything let it be the profiteer who stocked up on substitutes and took it out of the families in the cities.

Recent advance in mill feeds resulted in losses on outstanding contracts. Isn't it time the consuming public benefited by reduced prices, owing to this unprecedented flour glut?

You can not go to a grocery store keeper in Washington and talk any flour glut to him. You will pay the same old price. It costs more to buy a 49-pound bag of flour, with a pound thrown in for the sack in this country, in any of the principal markets of the country, even at jobbers' prices or at retail groceries, than it does to buy it in London. We get no reduction in price when there is a glut in flour. Do you know why? It is one of the ineffable blessings of the Food Administration's control of things edible. They have not controlled anything except what the Government had to buy in bulk, in quantities running into hundreds of millions of dollars. Flour, wheat, iron, and steel, they bought and bought at Government prices. They fixed the price of those articles for the private consumer. What about the ninety-and-nine other articles that went into the kitchen? They soared until they touched the azure, and nobody complained except the man who had to pay the price. So we have gone along in that way. It is to continue. Government ownership of food, like railways and telephones, costs more the instant it undertakes anything.

One hundred million dollars will be appropriated. It will pass the Senate. Did anybody ever see an appropriation beaten here of late years? I have no recollection of it. Amendments have been adopted adding to the amount appropriated, but I have not seen any beaten to figure anything. This will pass like the others.

I am only registering my protest against this, Mr. President, as a few in the minority who think it is their duty so to do.

The procession moves rather rapidly. We have to keep up with it the best we can. With a censored press are we not allowed to know anything that is not supposed to be good for us? We are all in the attitude of Alice in Wonderland; poor trusting babes in the woods, that the executive minions come around and cover over with leaves once in a while, in order that we may sleep a little and wake to do what we are told.

I now read a letter. Here is a man who is doing what he is told because he has to. We have not that added consolation to lay the extreme unction to our souls that we could not help it; we were acting under order though we are supposed to possess some discretion.

I shall omit the name, but his older brother, a reputable member of the bar in Chicago, I have known for many years. The younger brother is in France. He dates a letter from Le Mans on the 11th day of December, 1918. There is an excuse for this soldier doing what he does. There is not any for us—absolutely none:

DEAR MOTHER AND DAD: It has been three months since I have had mail and I am lonesome and downhearted. My mail is somewhere in France, and the Lord only knows when I will get it. I hope and trust you are all well and happy. Life for the past month has been hell. It seems as though all the S. O. S. are against us—

Which I understand from those whom I have consulted means the service of supplies—

There are 490 of us in this camp. All of us have either been wounded or sick, and do you know what they have us doing—stevedore work, unloading coal, etc. While we do such work the S. O. S. are playing ball and writing letters. If you hear of me going to jail you will know I put one of these S. O. S. birds to sleep. It gets a fellow's goat after he has spent nine months in the lines and dodged death a few times, sleeping in shell holes, rain, and mud, and then have to come back here and do stevedore work about the camp.

The suffering poor in Petrograd. There is nobody around in Trotsky's jurisdiction now but those who sympathize with him. The rest of them have been dispatched. I will get to that in a minute. I do not want to break the continuity of this letter. The writer continues:

We spent most of the time in pup tents, while the S. O. S. were sleeping in barracks, with stoves and bunks in them. After two weeks of the above we were moved into barracks and told to make ourselves comfortable. Everyone got for himself a bunk, after carrying it about a half a mile and putting it together. We spent one night in it and were told to move, and in came negroes to sleep in the bunks we carried and built. They moved us into barracks without windows and doors, and we again had to sleep on the ground. It rained last night, and the barracks were as waterproof as a sponge. We have not seen a pay day in months, and they will not try and get our mail. So you see how miserable this makes things for us. The Eighty-sixth Division, as you know is the Blackhawk, and it comes from Chicago. They have been over here for four months, and they think it is awful because they have not gone back by this time. We have been here since October 31, 1917, and, according to the papers, they are going to ask Congress to pass a law which will give them authority to keep us over here indefinitely. I had hoped to be home by spring, but it looks as though it would be next winter before they would even start to send us back. Oh, well, we had an easy time of it. We were only in the following battles: Champagne, Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, Verdun, and the Argonne Forest, and in each one saw many of our pals fall from the Hun fire; but, regardless of all, I can come back and say I have done my bit to help win the war. I was in the first big American battle and the last one, and did not quit until I was forced to. It has been three long, weary months since I have heard from home, and I am lonesome and disgusted. I have been in this camp for a month, and, to tell you the truth, it has been the most miserable month I have spent since I have been here, and I have had some miserable days. I feel as bad and pretty near worse than when I was sent to the hospital, having been taken off the field of battle. All they think of back here is work us day and night. There are 400 from our division here. Every one has seen action and has been sick or wounded. Instead of giving us good living quarters, they house us in barracks without windows or doors, and, to top things off, we have been sleeping on the ground. You will not find the S. O. S. men living like this. They have warm barracks and bunks, and instead of working they write letters and play ball, and we have to do their work. I told you in one of my letters not to write me any more. Well, mother, cancel that order; it looks as though we will be here for a long time, so keep on writing. I must close, as I am out of news and disgusted. Hoping all are well and happy, I remain, with love,

Your son,

That is one. Here is another one. This second one has not gone across:

The boys at Camp Holabird have read with much interest the article in the Evening Sun of January 17.

On behalf of the boys, I would like to add to the statement of "A Holabirder."

The officers of this camp have told us that no case except a case of absolute dependency or a case where the absence of a man will be destructive to a business will be considered for a discharge.

They also have told us that after all the other camps had been demobilized "the Motor Transport Corps would have to stay in service until the last trunk had been picked up and the last box stored."

Now, a great part of the men of this camp are not only drafted, but are also in limited service. Why are we to be held until the rest of the Army is discharged?

There are thousands of men here repairing trucks. Surely this work is not of vital importance, nor is there any hurry about it when the Government has more new trucks on hand than they know what to do with.

We have been told that this is to be a permanent camp. If that is the case, there will be work here for 10 or 20 years. Will they hold us then?

The Government is in greater need of ships than trucks, and yet they can afford to pay civilians from eight to ten dollars a day to build them.

We do not mind working for the Government, but can't understand why we should do it any longer at $1 a day.

If they want these trucks repaired, why can't they give us our honorable discharge and then hire us as civilians to do the work at the same compensation awarded to the shipbuilding trade?

We are compelled to work side by side with civilians at Camp Holabird. These civilians live in barracks, while many of us are compelled to live in tents. They have the privileges of a civilian, while we are under strict military discipline. They are earning from four to ten dollars to every dollar we earn. Is this justice?

I know of no other camp in the country that had finer morale while the war was on. We worked night and day and never complained. Is it right to hold longer men who gave all they were allowed to give?

Since the men have been told that they can't even put in an application for discharge they are disheartened. The morale is gone.

It is costing the Government thousands of dollars to repair a single truck because the officers can not get the work out of the men.

We, as soldiers, can do nothing to help ourselves. We are under orders and, as good soldiers, obey them. But we want the public to know the facts. We want the public to help us.

Can not some responsible citizens of Baltimore arrange to hold a mass meeting of soldiers to talk these matters over with some one representing the Government? We have shown in the past that we can work and are ready to do it again.

If the Government can explain why it is necessary to do this work in this way, why we will dig in and finish it up in a hurry.

But as matters stand now, I am afraid it will take many years to finish our work here.

ANOTHER HOLABIRD.

CAMP HOLABIRD, January 18, 1919.

If we have so much sympathy for the Bolshevists, if we have sympathy that will take across, not with this hundred million dollars, it is true, but take across our food supplies in German tonnage to be furnished and enable the Germans to buy in the market—if we have enough for all that, why can we not get the price of food down in this country to something like a living rate? If we have time and money for that, why can we not get our young men out of the camps, who are working, doing, as one of them said, a stevedore's work for a dollar a day, and, as another in a camp says, doing work for a dollar a day on automobile repairing? Why can we not afford to get those men out of camp? You know why. I do not think there is anyone in Congress, in a majority, at least, now or hereafter, who will vote to remedy it. It will be left to the tender mercies of the War Department. It is because two distinguished officers of the American Federation of Labor say it would not do to demobilize the American soldier and send him back home on the general labor market, because it would cause a fall in wages. So the soldier is kept repairing trucks and shoveling coal in military camps in the United States and in France at a dollar a day under military orders, while those who work alongside of him as civilians and members of the union get from $4 to $10 a day. It is no wonder the boy in the letter asks his mother if she thinks this is justice. Organized labor overreaches itself when its leaders keep boys in the Army for the benefit of civilian labor unions.

The President has said the war is ended. Technically it is not so; practically it is. If it is, there is no reason why the demobilization of these men ought not to be had.

Go to the War Department, go as a minority Senator—I do not know the luck of the majority—I am not in their confidence at all times as a body—but I do know if you go in individual cases to the War Department to get a man out of the service to send him back to school or to take up his place in civilian life, they refuse to discharge him, and say, "Wait until his unit is reached and he is discharged in the ordinary course of affairs."

That is what the automobile repairer is doing; that is what the coal shoveler is doing at $1 a day—waiting for his unit to be discharged. If we can take care of these things at Petrograd, in Belgrade, in Greece, and in Armenia; if we can go over to the Ural Mountains, halfway around the world, with our charity, it seems to me as though we might begin to dispense a little of it at home.

I shall vote against every appropriation hereafter unless it is absolutely indispensable to either civilian or military needs. I will no longer lend myself here to being the good Samaritan of the world.

Every night, nearly, Mr. President, I pull down my old dog-eared volume of Don Quixote. I hope at some place there is a Cervantes living in this twentieth century. He can, if he has the proper literary qualifications, improve on Don Quixote. Don Quixote is abroad now, the knight-errant of the world, largely fighting windmills. It is a toss-up of a coin which one is Sancho Panza—whether it is Col. House or the other fellow. But, after all, it takes money. That is where our modern Don Quixote is a more expensive character than the one of the fifteenth century literature. He could get along with practically nothing—a crust of bread, a bag of figs. He drank from the brook and his horse browsed wherever it was handy.

It is time we quit such prodigality, Mr. President. Every spendthrift at last comes to the end of his accounting. We have spent money in fabulous sums. It seems a comedy of expensive errors now. It will be a financial tragedy later on. Men the extreme limit of whose ability would be to have or count a thousand dollars have been talking glibly around this Capitol of billions. They roll it under their tongues as if a billion dollars were a mere matter of official fiat. They do not think anybody will ever have to pay it, but pay day comes in all things; it is merely the length of the postponement.

It is in Congress nothing but appropriations. France can take care of herself. A cabled column came across last week, in which it was stated that work was offered Belgians, but they have been living on Hoover's charity so long that they do not care to work; they declined it when an occupation was open to them, because they knew they would be fed anyway. I do not undertake to indorse the truthfulness of that report, but it was a message which was cabled from abroad. Here are the changes that are constantly occurring. This is the official communique that was given out yesterday; this is the free press; this is the entire absence of censorship:

The President of the United States, the prime ministers and foreign ministers of the allied and associated powers and the Japanese representatives met at the Quai d'Orsay between 3 and 5.30 this afternoon and approved the proposal of President Wilson, which reads as follows.

Then it is set out—I shall not read it all, but only enough to point the argument on this question.

The single object the representatives of the associated powers have had in mind in their discussions of the course they should pursue with regard to Russia has been to help the Russian people, not to hinder them or to interfere in any manner with their right to settle their own affairs in their own way.

RUSSIAN PEOPLE FRIENDS.

They regard the Russian people as their friends, not their enemies, and are willing to help them in any way they are willing to be helped. It is clear to them that the troubles and distrust of the Russian people will steadily increase, hunger and privation of every kind become more and more acute, more and more widespread, and more and more impossible to relieve unless order is restored and normal conditions of labor, trade, and transportation once more created, and they are seeking some way in which to assist the Russian people to establish order.

They recognize the absolute right of the Russian people to direct their own affairs without dictation or direction of any kind from outside. They do not wish to exploit or make use of Russia in any way.

RECOGNIZE REVOLUTION.

They recognize the revolution without reservation, and will in no way and in no circumstances aid or give countenance to any attempt at a counter-revolution.

It is not their wish or purpose to favor or assist any one of the organized groups now contending for the leadership and guidance of Russia, as against the others. Their sole and sincere purpose is to do what they can to bring Russia peace and an opportunity to find her way out of her present troubles.

That is what we are permitted to know—just what can be put on the cables by official authority, because the cables are Government wires. On this side the Russian Economic League published in a New York paper to-day their views of the situation. I shall not, as in the case of the other document, read it at length, but only refer to certain passages. This communication, which is a paid advertisement, is signed by Alexander W. Behr and five others. They say:

There is no denying the exceptional talents of the leaders of Bolshevism in phraseology. Having been for scores of years put aside from practical work by the Russian Imperial Government, the Russian revolutionary workers have to an extraordinary degree developed their faculties in the use of speech.

They are precisely like the average university professor, some of whom are no longer creative forces in this country, but are firebrands of sedition and destruction. There is scarcely a large university in this country—including those at the head of the list—that has not one or more of these seditious pests in its faculty. They teach a doctrine that is far worse than that of Eugene Debs. They have not the courage of Victor Berger; they have not that devotion to principle that Karl Marx had in his lifetime, or that later his modern German exponent, August Bebel, had. They are gentlemen who live in the closet and expound their supernal wisdom in the ears of their students. I have paid my respects to this gentry under their own rooftree in the cloistered shades of learning, and I will continue to do so. They are a greater menace in this country to-day than the I. W. W. and Haywood. Debs is in the penitentiary; but these shallow, insincere, decayed philosophers of a decadent philosophy are teaching their insidious poison to the American youth in the guise of sociology and economics. It takes 10 years after the average boy gets away from the university with his degrees to educate him in the actual affairs of life, so that he knows enough to transact business free from the imbecility of their teachings. Outside of the manual-training schools and the schools of technology there is not one practical thing taught to counteract such poison. But the peace commission, with carload upon carload of freight in the way of documents, are abroad supplementing the efforts of our representative, and some of the kind of professors to whom I have referred are on that commission. We are asked here in this bill to make this appropriation of $100,000,000 in such a way that it may be spent by some of the practical statesmen who are putting into operation the theories propounded by those professors.

The Russian Economic League know what they are writing about. They continue:

In fact, the rank of Bolshevism and its camouflage, the Soviets, did not only include in corpore the whole of the so-called black hundred and the hideous agents of political research, but all such people as had an irresistible desire for a fat living without the corresponding work and talents, all who had long ago lost their conscience.

I think I ought to preface this with the opening paragraph, which reads:

The Russian Economic League, founded by Russian business men at present living in New York, learns from newspaper reports with deep feeling of anguish and regret of the proposal to admit to the peace conference as representatives of Russia the agents of the so-called Bolshevist "government."

It is proposed, according to the official communication from Paris, setting forth the action taken yesterday, to recognize the Bolshevist government. So this hundred million dollars, or a portion of it, will be dispatched to that country to feed either their victims, if any can be found, or to feed the oppressors themselves. Just how much of the one or the other no one can tell. So long as we are asked here to devote a hundred million dollars, or any part of it, to the support of this element in Russia, that broke down, it is true, an ancient tyranny, but in doing so exposed the allies to mortal danger and increased the difficulty when we joined with them in April, 1917, of arriving at a successful conclusion, I think it is not a part even of charity, to say nothing of diplomatic or political reasons, to send a dollar into that country.

Let them restore order. It is said in the official communications that they must work out their own form of government, that their salvation lies in their own hands. Let them work it out, and when that is done they will take care of themselves. A government that will protect the fruits of a Russian peasant's toil will need no charity. Russians will care for themselves then. If an opportunity to work had been given to those in Russia who wished to remain at peace, there would be no famine in that unhappy country. Nobody could work there. The very creed, the political doctrine carried into effect by those whom the peace conference proposes to recognize as a government is violence and robbery, pillage and murder. The whole Bolshevist movement in Russia is a movement of crime and criminals. It is producing its natural result.

If it is the only government they can frame, let them send their representatives to the peace conference; let them send their ministers to this Capital. They will be recognized in both places, I presume. It will be a government, such a one as they have elected to form. Let it be so; but the question of voting to them some or all of this $100,000,000, in the discretion of Mr. Hoover and his associates, is another question entirely. A government that is a chronic object of charity and practices repudiation of its debts will attract attention.

We have now reached a point in these peace negotiations, Mr. President, where it is absolutely certain that a portion of this hundred million dollars will be transmitted to Russia for the relief of her famine-stricken population. I believe in applying to nations something of the principle I apply to individuals. I know sometimes a humanitarian says it is a harsh creed, but it is the one nature applies and it is the one that both the Old and the New Testaments apply to us. There is no escape from the penalties attending the natural and reasonable consequences of our own acts. Russia is reaping what she has sown. We had no part in her overthrow. We did not frame the tyranny that made this necessary or possible. The only thing that we could say is that we harbored one of their principal agents in New York City for some months.

If it were a mere matter of Bolshevism in Russia and a hundred millions, or a part of it, to relieve the suffering there, if it stopped there, probably no American citizen could complain; but that is not the end of it. As this communication from the New York paper continues, in another paragraph which I have not read, Bolshevism is international. It is not content with disorder and sedition, pillage and murder, within the jurisdiction where it then is. Its mission, fanatical or otherwise, is to spread its bloody doctrine around the world. The Bolshevists believe it is their duty, as a sincere Mohammedan does, to spread by fire and sword their belief to the uttermost parts of the earth. They will not be content when they have seized our supplies. There are no representatives there from this Government that can act. Mr. Francis, of St. Louis, is no longer a minister to whom we can appeal. He lives, while there, in fear of physical violence. Our consuls are seized; our consular agents are driven from post to post, until most of them from whom we have any intelligence are living under the muzzles of English guns, if at all, in the far north of Russia. The Bolshevists respect no obligation of civilized life in private. They know no binding obligation of civilized government. They carry their doctrine wherever they can abuse their hospitality. Wherever they sojourn they spread their poison, like the guest whom you shelter under your roof who rises at the dead hour of night and places the torch to your dwelling. Their forbears were the nihilists of the early days, the practical anarchists, who believe that all government is wrong. The period of universal destruction is their aim. They avow they will girdle the earth with fire and ruin.

They are here. They are in this country. How many of you have read the magazine called The Liberator? The January number, 1919, is the eleventh one of the first year's issue. It is an anarchistic sheet. It calls upon those who are without property to remember that the Bolshevist brother in Europe was without property, but the proletariat of the American race must unite and rise and strike the capitalist until he has lost his possessions, or his life, if need be, to relieve those who are without property. The great middle group of Americans are designated for destruction. A capitalist is not merely a millionaire; he is anyone who employs another for wages. In practice in Russia it is any person who has anything of value a Bolshevist wants. That government has confiscated all the private property in land. The answer is famine. We are asked to devote part of this $100,000,000 to remedy the natural consequence of such a government. Having produced such a wilderness of suffering and injustice in Russia, this magazine invites us to repeat it in the United States. Who will feed us when we have reaped the folly if we follow the path marked by this sinister crew? That is in the magazine. It is circulated through the mails in this country. The vigilant Mr. Burleson is so occupied in preaching Government ownership, in extending the power of his department, in grasping great enterprises, not one of which anybody around him, with but one exception, ever had the ability to frame or to administer, he is so busy in this that he has no time to extinguish these firebrands of Bolshevism in our own country. Is there a subterranean sympathy with them?

The other day I had a letter from William Bross Lloyd, whose paper was suppressed in Chicago. I had another from Adolph Germer. He, too, was not only forbidden the use of the mails and his paper suppressed, but he was tried with Berger a few days ago and was convicted under the espionage act. I read the evidence, the press reports, and have considerable bodies of the evidence from friends in Chicago.

The evidence in the trial of Berger was a mere Berean lesson leaf for Sunday school use compared with the boiling sedition, threatened disorder, and bloodshed that there are in this magazine. If Lloyd and Berger had prostrated themselves at the feet of the Executive, they would not have been disturbed. I will advertise the magazine. I have no compunctions in speaking its name. The Liberator ought to be suppressed. It is not the freedom of speech that is involved in permitting such a sheet to circulate. The freedom of the press has nothing to do with it, any more than the freedom of speech for the agitator who mounts the curbstone and preaches lawlessness and physical force. No one can say that that is a part of the freedom of speech—that his arrest, prosecution, conviction, and subsequent confinement, that any of these processes is an interference with the liberty or freedom of speech in this country.

There are limits beyond which every liberty passes into lawless license and crime. There is no such thing as absolute liberty in civilized communities. Civil liberty is the natural liberty of the person restrained by wise and just laws, necessary for the general good of the community. Therefore, in suppressing such sheets, in stopping the blatant mouths of such agitators, this Government or any State government does not interfere with the right of free speech or of a free press. It only protects itself against those who abuse that right and expose the established order of the community to destruction.

We are asked—and I presume, when the peace conference shall have acted upon that, it will be final—to recognize the Bolshevist government in Russia. We will come to that in due time in the Senate. I am opposed to dealing leniently, when it comes to an appropriation, with those who placed themselves in the bed where they now lie. We have in our country here many of those like the publishers and editors of this magazine. They are Russians. Turn to the editorial staff. It is a Bolshevist document. They are following out exactly the creed and practice of their brethren in Russia. The magazine itself refers frequently to Trotzky as a "friend of humanity." I have heard that phrase so long that whenever anybody begins to talk to me about being a "friend of humanity" I reach down and seize my valuables to see whether or not they are safe yet. I am through with the professional charity worker. I know many of them in private life. My charity will go to organized charity, where it can not be misdirected; but the professional "friend of humanity" always has something to benefit him.

This "friend of humanity" who is editing the magazine calls upon the proletariat of this country to organize. The magazine reminds them that the Government of Russia is now composed of their brethren. It is a direct appeal to the I. W. W. It is a part, I would not say of the German systematic crusade, because likely that day is over, but it is a part of the Russian system operated there originally by the German. They appeal to every criminal and vagrant; they appeal to everybody who is opposed to the existing order of things.

I said the other day that the way to deal with those of the Trotzky variety in this country was with military force. I say so again, notwithstanding the statement of a distinguished Senator in this body, one whom I very greatly admire and trust, when he says:

> I do not know whether if you feed them they can fight better or whether that is going to stop it, but I like his plan of stopping it by feeding them better than the plan of a distinguished Republican, who would stop it by shooting them. You will stop Bolshevism not by feeding them, you will stop it by removing injustices, and that is the way you will stop it in this country. Make no mistake about that.

With due deference to this distinguished Senator, if he would have you understand by that argument that such unrest, such disorder, such manifestations as the I. W. W., such defendants as Haywood and his ninety-odd associates, and Berger and his associates, as Mooney and his associates, as those recently tried and convicted in Sacramento, Cal., and their associates, as the same crew who are about the offices of the magazine in question—that all of them so conduct themselves and advocate violence because of the injustice practiced upon either them or somebody else, he is in error. I earnestly hope he does not so mean it. With any relief for the unfortunate, the humble, the struggling for better living conditions, he and I will join earnestly, I know. To justify lawlessness and violence as a social betterment has no place in this Republic. There is no room for Bolshevism here and no reason to attempt it.

What is that injustice that would justify Mr. Haywood? What is the injustice that would justify Mr. Mooney? Whether he is guilty or not, I am not now called upon to say. He was tried by a court in California under their laws. What is the injustice with Mr. Berger and his conviction? Were they protesting against injustice for which they were prosecuted, merely because they protested? Are those who are here in our country of the I. W. W.'s, preaching disorder and violence and murder, and practicing it, redressing an injustice which justifies them in their cause?

The great public, the final trial jury in this country, will be called upon shortly to discriminate between those riotous, torch-bearing assassins and those who are willing if they think there is an injustice peaceably to redress that injustice.

But the Senator does himself an injustice when he uses such an argument. This is no time for apologizing to the disorderly, to that supposed vast rabble that hangs upon the edge of every great population of a metropolitan center. This is no time, Mr. President, to be apologizing for that criminal movement that is always found to center in large cities and from there carry their organization outside.

Rather, Mr. President, now is the time for us to call a halt, to think clearly, to act without fear of consequence at the ballot box. This is no time to think about our election. That is the weakness of Congress. That is one reason why it universally has invited contempt. It is because they think more of their seats than they think of their behavior. The public is quick to discern. It is the weakest branch of the Government. It falls a victim more readily to every economic disease, to every passing tumult of the hour. Whenever some element of the kind I am describing belches its corrosive influence upon the multitude, you see Members of Congress begin to waver and apologize and take to the dark corners and wait until the storm is over.

Friday, January 24, 1919.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, an appropriation of $100,000,000 will add to the burden and subtract from the tax sources of the various States. These matters mentioned in the message of the governor of Pennsylvania by the Senator from that State [Mr. PENROSE] work along two lines: One is the taxation, as in the inheritance tax, of an object of taxation which has heretofore been exclusively that of the State; the other is the withdrawal, by constant assumption of Government ownership, of property from State taxes, so that it is no longer possible to derive a dollar from those sources. From those two causes the sources of revenue of the States are being constantly diminished. It results in increased taxes upon land and upon personal property for State and local purposes. It will reach the limit of a State government's endurance. The Members of the Senate represent nationally the people of the United States, and in a very large way we represent the reserved powers of the States in this body. It becomes the duty of the Senate, therefore, to protect the sources of taxation so that the revenues of the States may not be unduly curtailed.

Last night, Mr. President, I was referring to the fact that the disorderly element in the United States do not base their complaints upon any real injustice. Their complaints are fancied grievances; their complaints are the ones that grow not out of the social compact or civil society but out of the individual characteristics of those making the complaints. The disorder that is sought to be organized by the I. W. W.'s, by the Socialists who favor "direct action," by the alien element residing principally in the larger cities of the country, arises from no real grievance against the laws or the institutions of this country, if tested by the light of experience and by the merit of the individual making the complaint or those criticized.

I am not in accord with the Senator from Iowa when he says Bolshevism in this country can be destroyed or removed by removing the injustice. Justice will be done without threats of violence. It will come from the innate consciousness of the American people; it will move along the line of legislation in public and of private action in the various industries and occupations of the country; but there is no such thing in this country as a grievance that requires correction by violence. It is this purpose that the Bolshevist has in Russia and in other parts of Europe, and that the alien who has immigrated to this country and brought with him his doctrine proposes to institute here. The discontent that manifests its disposition to remedy its fancied grievances by violence is purely an alien discontent. It is made in Europe; a large part of it is made in Germany; and some of it is made in Russia. The criminal Bolshevism of this country is not based upon injustice. It grows out of the character of the individual. It is to that part of the movement of organized crime in this country that I directed my remarks yesterday evening. I will conclude this morning along that line.

Resuming the reading from the Russian Economic League, to which I referred yesterday, published as an advertisement in some of the New York papers, there are further paragraphs that illuminate the issue in this country. They say:

> There is no doubt, however, that the happiness of humanity can not be attained by idling and destroying but only by constructive activity, by incentives to and development of labor, talents, creative genius, and initiative.
> The Russian Economic League steadfastly keeps in remembrance the promise of President Wilson to stand by Russia.
> Awaiting when and how this help will take form, the Russian Economic League can not but loudly give expression to its sentiment that it could not even imagine that help to Russia could take the form of admitting the theorists of Bolshevism to the world's tribune, from which to preach their corrupting lies, and of allowing the practitioners of Bolshevism "a breathing space" for the further strengthening of their "organization."
> The Russian Economic League considers it its civic duty to the allies once more to remind them of the handwriting on the wall; Russian Bolshevism is a danger to the civilization of the world.

These men know this menace, what it means in Europe, and what it will mean here if recogniton be given it. In this morning's cablegrams, reported in most of the newspapers, it is said:

> In the meantime prominent anti-Bolshevik leaders in Paris are not clear on their course, and the first reports that they were favorable to the plan have been followed by a statement by such leaders as Sergius Sazonoff that they would not sit at the table with assassins.
> The semiofficial Temps also asserts that the supreme council's proposal "permits traitors who withdrew Russia from the war and turned the entire German strength against France to be received on the same footing as the faithful."

They condemn it in unmeasured terms. I realize the difficulty of preserving peace, with Russia in constant turmoil. Some legitimate Government must be organized in the course of affairs. I can not, however, reconcile myself, if the matter is to be voted on in this body, directly or indirectly to the recognition of the present Bolshevist government in Russia. That government was described in May, 1918, as follows by a member of the so-called International Federation, which is a part of the internationalism which is promoted by such spirits. He says that:

> The Bolsheviki had many friends in Canada and the Russian Bolsheviki had proved themselves in advance of western civilization. We must destroy the very elements of the world civilization before we can begin to revolutionize the world.

This was said in New York on the 4th day of May, 1918, without protest, without the arrest of the alien in our borders who uttered such sentiments.

At the same time Norman Angell, of the British Labor Party ostensibly, but in reality repudiated by the labor elements of Great Britain, who is merely one of a group of radical socialists, made an address at the socialist conference in New York

City on the same day, in which he said that "the American Constitution is the worst in the world." That, too, passed without protest.

On the 28th of December, 1918, in the trial in Chicago of Victor Berger and his associate defendants, Dr. Carl Haessler, formerly instructor at the University of Illinois, and later employed as a special writer on the Milwaukee Leader, Mr. Berger's paper, was brought from the United States Army disciplinary barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., where he is serving a 12-year term for refusing to wear a soldier's uniform, and testified. His testimony was intended to show that Victor L. Berger, of Milwaukee, editor of the Leader, influenced him in no way in his determination to refuse to accept military duty. He said:

Berger is too slow a bird; he is not fast enough to travel in my company, politically or economically.

Continuing his testimony, he described himself as having been graduated from a university; that he won a Cecil Rhodes scholarship at Oxford University, England. He first became interested in socialism, he declared, while attending that university, and later was influenced by the books of Prof. Dewey, of Columbia University, and expressed admiration for the Bolsheviki government of Russia. He is one of a very numerous group to which I alluded yesterday evening.

I have a letter from Mr. Adolph Germer, one of Mr. Berger's codefendants in Chicago, dated November 2, 1918, in which he demands—that the people of Russia have complete freedom to solve their internal problems—

With which no complaint can be made—and that the integrity of the Russian territory as well as that of Finland, the Baltic Provinces, Poland, Lithuania, Ukraine, and the other border Provinces by preserved.

He demands, further, that there be—international conferences for the exchange of opinions between the labor groups of the belligerent and neutral nations.

He demands that—this Government refuse to consider any proposal for economic war after the war.

He demands also—and this letter was written before the armistice was signed—"immediate peace."

This is a part of the Bolshevist creed. They desire everyone else to be at peace but themselves; and in Russia, where their government, so called, has the power, there is no peace. Their government in practice is continuous pillage, murder, and famine.

I wish now to refer to the President's message of March 11, 1918, addressed to the Soviet council. He says:

May I not take advantage of the meeting of the congress of the Soviets to express the sincere sympathy which the people of the United States feel for the Russian people at this moment, when the German power has been thrust in to interrupt and turn back the whole struggle for freedom and substitute the wishes of Germany for the purpose of the people of Russia?

Although the Government of the United States is unhappily not now in a position to render the direct and effective aid it would wish to render, I beg to assure the people of Russia, through the congress, that it will avail itself of every opportunity to secure for Russia once more complete sovereignty and independence in her own affairs and full restoration to her great rôle in the life of Europe and the modern world.

The whole heart of the people of the United States is with the people of Russia in the attempt to free themselves forever from autocratic government and become the masters of their own life.

In response to this, on March 23, 1918, the Soviet council returned the following reply:

The all-Russian congress of Soviets expresses its appreciation to the American people, and first of all the laboring people and exploited classes in the United States, for the message sent by President Wilson to the congress of Soviets in this time when the Russian Socialist Soviet republic is living through most difficult trials.

The Russian republic uses the occasion of the message from President Wilson to express to all people who are dying and suffering from the horrors of this imperialistic war its warm sympathy and firm conviction that the happy time is near when the laboring masses in all bourgeois countries will throw off the capitalist yoke and establish a socialist state of society, which is the only one capable of assuring a permanent and just peace, as well as the culture and well-being of all who toil.

That is the resolution of the Russian Soviet congress of date March 14, 1918, but transmitted to us under date of March 23, 1918, as I have indicated.

These documents indicate the view taken by the President as well as by the present Bolshevist government itself. The Soviet council was the congress at that time. What does the Bolshevist government propose to do? First, it has confiscated all land titles in that country. It proposes to take the lands from those who have them and to divide them among those who do not have them. It has confiscated all domestic credits above 10,000 rubles; it has repudiated the entire national debt of Russia, including that to the United States. In yesterday's press report, it is true, there was a claim that Lenine and Trotsky had found at this time that it was impracticable to confiscate all of the land titles. They have found difficulties in dividing the land so as to produce satisfaction, so that for the time being they are reputed to have ceased their efforts in that direction. The confiscation of all credits, domestic and foreign, however, still remains a part of the policy of the Russian government.

It is well known that they have repudiated their religious obligations; that they war upon the church; that a priest or a doctor of divinity is an object of derision and assault; that every place of worship, every church, synagogue, and cathedral in that country has been reduced to a civil basis, taken from the clergy who ministered to their parishioners or congregations. The Bolshevist government is admitted to be a godless government, as well as a violent one. They are only a little in advance of the Socialists in this country. There is no thorough Socialist who expounds his doctrines who admits any religious obligations. He is purely a materialist. He does not believe in any inspired or revealed word of Divinity; he believes only in what can be secured in this world, and teaches that there is no hereafter. Believing that, it is easy enough to understand and follow what else they teach.

On October 26, 1918, under the heading of "British wireless service," from the British capital, another rule or law recently made operative by the Bolshevist government is reported:

SOVIETS FOUND LOVE BUREAU.

LONDON, October 26.

Russian maidens under the jurisdiction of certain provincial Bolshevik soviets become the "property of the state" when they reach the age of 18 years, and are compelled to register at a government "bureau of free love," according to the official gazette of the Vladimir soviet of workers and soldiers deputies, which recently published that soviet's decree on the subject.

Under the decree, a woman having registered, "has the right to choose from among men between 19 and 50 a cohabitant husband." The consent of the man chosen is not necessary, the decree adds, the man chosen having no right to make any protest.

A similar privilege of choosing from among the registered women is given every man between 19 and 50 "without the consent of the women." This provision is described as "in the interest of the state."

Opportunities for choosing husbands and wives is to be presented once each month, the decree stated. Children born of such marriages are to become the "property of the State." Stringent rules and penalties are laid down for the protection of girls less than 18.

The decree further states that it has been based on the "excellent" example of similar decrees already issued at Luga, Kolpin, and other places. A similar "project of provisional rights in connection with the socialization of women in the city of Khvelinsk and vicinity" has been published in the gazette of the workers and soldier deputies of that city.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask what the Senator is reading from? I did not catch it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am reading from a wireless-message press report from London, England, of October 26, 1918, of a report of a decree of the Bolshevist authorities from certain districts in Russia.

Later, on January 4, 1919, to show that the matter does not remain quiescent, the town council of Petrograd, according to an exchange telegraph dispatch from Copenhagen to London, has decided that all unmarried women between the ages of 18 and 45 shall be provided with husbands selected by the council. The children of these unions, it is added, will not be allowed to remain with their parents, but will be educated under the control of the Soviet government. I might add here that it is a favorite principle with a purely socialistic State to follow out these plans. The children are to be taken as the wards of the State, provided for, and raised to maturity as such wards. The parents have no more concern with them than the sire and dam of the beasts of the field after the young shall have been born. It is a favorite theory all of the time which they seek to put in practice, that along with the godlessness of such a government comes the total irresponsibility of the parents and the full responsibility of the State to take the offspring and bring it to maturity. This is a part of the end of individual responsibility, to keep pace with the abolition of the private ownership of property, all of which shall be assumed by the State, toward which we are asked to advance on this country recently.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. As the Senator probably noticed, in yesterday morning's paper there was a dispatch from Copenhagen or from Stockholm in which were quoted recent publications by Soviet newspapers, in which they declare against all forms of religion, against the perpetuity of the church, in favor of the taking of all church property, and a general denunciation of religion.

Of course, the Senator must realize that when any sort of government is founded upon pure atheism and a denunciation of God, of religion, of all spiritual forces, of all moral forces, the character of legislation just referred to necessarily would follow. Such a government as that is an enemy to all forms of law or order or progress or civilization; and that is the kind of a government to which, apparently, we are giving some recognition at this time at the Paris conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the Senator for the addition to what I have offered on that subject. It is a very timely and pertinent addition.

Mr. KING. And, if the Senator will pardon me, I might say that that is the government that is exciting the interest of the socialists, the pacifist, the traitors, the enemies of America in this country; and we find in a number of the publications and in the utterances of some of these "uplifters" a deep solicitude for the Bolsheviks of Russia. Any man who supports Bolshevism is an enemy to civilization, is an enemy to our form of government; and it seems to me that the American people unanimously should denounce that form of government, give it no countenance, and recognize it in no possible way, directly or indirectly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I entirely agree with the Senator on that subject; and it is because I have some settled beliefs of my own on that subject that I am taking the time of the Senate. I believe that no more important service can be rendered here and now than to awake the people of this country to the infernal, un-American, alien doctrine that has planted itself in some of the large cities, and is seeking recruits even among the agricultural population of this country. Few know what it means, in its final analysis, outside of those who have been studying it, and those who seek to spread it over the country. They know; and, as the Senator from Utah has forcefully stated, it is an atheistic and godless government, that fails to recognize any such thing as a moral tie in the affairs of this world.

I believe some of our troubles are traceable directly to the decay of some of those strong, moral obligations that belonged to the generations before us. Religious sentiment has come with so many to be a mere matter of form. It is quite fashionable to make light of it. It has become the custom to think that the affairs of this world take precedence of everything else. I have the misfortune myself to be a member of no church. I believe in the most universal tolerance; but, without the benefit of the associations and of the advantages that belong to such organizations, if I believed that this world ended here I would despair. If there is no such thing as religious obligation left; if a great government of 180,000,000 Russian people are finally to be governed and their foreign relations molded by such an organization, its hands steeped in the slaughter of its own citizens, its treasury filled with the proceeds of the pillage and robbery of both the native and the alien residents in that country—if such a government is to present itself in this Chamber, then I believe it to be the sovereign duty of every American to resist the established relations that may be sought.

Now, Mr. President, pertinently to this point, on this appropriation, will France be fed from the $100,000,000? I think not. Will Belgium? Possibly; but Belgium has been cared for by private charity. The Red Cross and the money given in this country and elsewhere have kept Belgian citizens in their day of need, and when the great trial had fallen upon them, such of them as could be reached were sustained and soothed by the hand of private charity.

Will it go to England or any of her colonial dependencies? It is manifestly not intended to be used in that way. Some may go to the Armenians, the Syrians, certain portions of the Balkan Provinces, and Serbia; but these items of relief are comparatively insignificant. I state now that the greater part of this $100,000,000 will be spent in Russia in establishing relations with the present Bolshevist government. They have a keen appetite for plunder and a scent for spoils unrivaled elsewhere in the world. They are cosmopolitan in their tastes. It is immaterial to them whose gold it is—whether it is German or American. They take it all with cheerful impartiality, because gold is gold, from whatever source it comes. They welcome it any way except working for it. Because of the message, nearly a year ago, in which the President showed himself as willing then to open relations with that government, followed by the press reports of yesterday, where they propose to admit its representatives to the peace table, upon his motion, it has been evident that the purpose of this conference is only expressing the long-settled purpose of the Executive in the recognition of that government. A large part of this money, therefore, I think will be spent in Russia; and if so, it must be spent under the administration of the Bolshevist authorities.

It was no platonic love between the German and the Bolshevist a year or more ago when the celebrated Brest-Litovsk treaty was concluded. There was as much concert of opinion as there was receipt of German money. Therefore, when I turn to what Germany is favoring and find it so similar to the Bolshevist government, I am not surprised at what has happened.

The materialist element in Germany is very large. The philosophic socialist is much in evidence there. He is a materialist of the grossest sort. They are rapidly developing the same class of godless population there that is found in Russia. Naturally with this lack of moral obligation there comes first the relation with the weaker sex. The civilization of all the races that have inhabited the world show an unfailing index in their treatment of womankind. Among the savage she is a beast of burden. She is merely a convenience, not a companion. As nations advance woman is emancipated, she ranks with man and is revered as the mother of the race.

Here is a pamphlet on this subject circulated in Germany, based upon the future need of the German Army because "the military strength of the people," it says, "depends in part upon the number of men able to bear arms." Its main proposals read as follows:

> Women in all classes of society who have reached a certain age are, in the interests of the fatherland, not only authorized but called upon to enter into a secondary marriage which is supported by personal inclination. Only a married man may be the object of this inclination, and he must have the consent of his married wife. This condition is necessary in order to prevent the mischief which otherwise might surely be expected.
> The offspring of these lawful secondary marriages bear the name of their mother, and are handed over to the care of the State, unless the mother assumes responsibility for them. They are to be regarded in every respect as fully equal members of society. The mothers wear a narrow wedding ring as a sign of their patriotism. The secondary marriage can be dissolved as soon as its object has been attained.

This professor, by the way, is connected with a German university. Like all of these plans for the amelioration of human society, they come from distinguished professors, that group of intellectuals who are continually seeing things that are so far in advance of the possibilities of human nature.

Continuing, this professor says he thinks the object of this new institution can be fulfilled in 20 years, and that secondary marriages might then be abolished. He ends his pamphlet as follows:

> The difficulties consist solely in ethical scruples, which, notwithstanding the issue of the proper regulations by the State, will continue to operate until conscience has disposed of them. Thus this question becomes a religious question, which can be solved only with the help of the clergy. It rests, therefore, with the women and the clergy, assisted by the State, to determine whether Germany shall be able not only to maintain herself on her present pinnacle of morality, but by her own strength to stand up in the future as in the present to the pressure of enemies who are increasing numerically.

Then there is a leaflet which was distributed among the soldiers. One is entitled "Empty Cradles—a Soldier's Duty." A translation of the German is as follows:

> Soldiers, a grave danger assails the fatherland by reason of the dwindling birth rate. The cradles of Germany are empty to-day; it is your duty to see that they are filled.
> You bachelors, when your leave comes, marry at once the girl of your choice. Make her your wife without delay.
> The fatherland needs healthy children.
> You married men and your wives should put jealousy from your minds and consider whether you have not also a duty to the fatherland.
>
> You should consider whether you may not honorably contract an alliance with one of the million of bachelor women. See if your wife will not sanction the relation.
> Remember, all of you, the empty cradles of Germany must be filled.

It is proposed further that the universities of Germany shall enter upon a crusade. Not only are the clergy to be invited to establish a new moral sense nationally, but these professors are to teach it in their universities, a promiscuous marriage alliance with the offspring owned by the State as the new creed of the social compact, to be taught by grave professors as a part of the sociology we hear something about in so many universities in this country. It is but a short step from all property in common to all women in common. A promiscuous alliance is part of a common creed. One injustice most clamorously protested against is that the property-owning classes have the handsomest women.

Therefore, Mr. President, it occurs to me that when there is such a similarity between Germany and their avowed purposes and the practices of the Bolshevist government, there is what these men say in the advertisement of day before yesterday to remember that Russian Bolshevism is a danger to the civilization of the world.

Great honor is to be attached to the French members of the peace conference for refusing to admit to that conference representatives of that government. If they have unhappily yielded, it is because by pressure begun by the Executive of this country to yield; it is more in order to make some progress even at a sacrifice of principle than anything else that such recognition has been given.

Therefore this appropriation, Mr. President, of $100,000,000, a part of which is bound to be spent in feeding the supporters of that government, ought not for a moment to pass this body.

Some of the same phraseology to which this advertisement alludes finds lodgment unfortunately in the mind of our Executive. I read yesterday evening the statement that the Bolshevist in Russia having control of the government has an exceptional talent in phraseology. There seems to be a sort of brotherhood of expression. They all have a similar language. They are rather haberdashers, as the French novelist puts it, in pronouns. They speak of themselves a great deal. They demand their particular kind of justice as the price of peace. This Government, State and National, will do justice to every unfortunate, but it will not compromise with organized criminal movements in whatever form they may manifest themselves. The President uses the following language:

The men in the trenches, who have freedom from the economic serfdom to which some of them have been accustomed, will, it is likely, return to their homes with a new view and a new impatience of all mere political phrases, and will demand real thinking and sincere action.

I want the sincere action now for the men discharged from the military service. Their destitution is the most disgraceful "economic serfdom" I can imagine. Instead of begging on the streets of the cities when he reaches our shores, he ought to have this $100,000,000 appropriated for his relief instead of sending it to Europe, and a large part of it to be used in the relief of the Bolshevist who avows and practices what I regard as the most infamous doctrine of any age or any people.

When the President comes back there will be the usual crusade. It will be accentuated by this appropriation. By appropriating this money with no limitation on the use of it in Russia by the authority to which I have referred, it will be regarded as a tacit indorsement. After a while the tentative treaty will be presented to this body. Then the usual publicity campaigns will begin.

It is proposed, so certain press dispatches say, by the President, that a continental tour be engaged in by him as soon as the peace treaty is presented to this body. Whatever protest may be made, there is a censored press yet. This body will have but very little of the actual negotiations which lead up to the formation of the treaty. It will be put into this Chamber, referred to the committee, discussed there, and some hearings possibly had. In due time it will be out on the floor of the Senate, and we will be urged to instantly ratify it. A campaign will be started. In it will be the recognition of the Bolshevist government. The espionage act will still be in force. If Congress is not in session, no one can answer the President without danger of prison. It means that all of that alien element in this country will take fresh courage. I wish for my part that Congress would enact a law before the 4th day of March that would deport every one of that ill-favored ilk to the country of their origin and forever bar our gates against them. There is not one of them who can not pass an educational test. That is no bar. They can pass any educational test proposed. But their character as importers of alien, un-American doctrines of disorder and sedition ought to bar their entrance to any civilized government in the world.

But in this continental campaign the President will presume to build a backfire against every Senator who refuses to approve his handiwork. Who can answer him fairly if the espionage law remains? He is sacred, and prosecution, not argument, is the answer. Instantly every department, board, bureau, commission, everybody on the pay roll of the Government, will be unkenneled and turned into a campaign committee to urge the ratification of the treaty as it is presented. That is what is likely to happen to this Senate.

How will these departments be used? Let me give you a single instance. Last November a great many moving-picture slides were sent out all over this country. A friend preserved one of a great flood of them. I have it in my hand. It bears this inscription, with the franking privilege:

United States Fuel Administration.
Washington.
Official business.
Miners are needed to dig coal.
Please run this.
Penalty for private use to avoid payment of postage, $300.

This is addressed to the Globe Theater of a certain city in a Western State.

I will now read for the benefit of the reporter, in order that it may be placed in the RECORD in due form, these slides to show just how the Government power is prostituted to coerce not only the voter but to be used in the same way to coerce every Senator to ratify the treaty as it is presented. I know how these powers have been abused in the past, and I know how they will be used again. Here is one:

Col. Roosevelt during the War with Spain said a refusal to sustain the President this year will in the eyes of Europe be read as the refusal to sustain the war. If then, why not now?

That was prepared out of a Government appropriation and sent out during a political campaign.

I read another one. In the instance which I now read from the slide there is a picture of the President in the upper left-hand corner and the following language to be thrown on the screen:

Washington and Lincoln were hampered by critics. Do not hamper Wilson. Elect a man who will help him win the war.

That is paid for out of Government funds and sent out by the Fuel Department, franked through Burleson's Post Office, to be put out at the various moving-picture shows for the entertainment of the multitude at Government expense, a purely campaign document. I have no objection to using it if it were sent out from political headquarters, but I do object to using money to coerce the voters or to induce them out of the taxes contributed by every taxpayer.

Again, another slide, having a like picture of the President, contains the following:

Unity of action is essential now in Washington as unity of command is in France. Elect men in harmony with Wilson, who will help him win the war.

This was all received at or about the time of the Executive's celebrated letter of October, 1918, in which he said there could be no patriot elected except on a Democratic ticket. These were sent out literally by the hundreds of thousands to carry the same message. It was the use of Government funds to run a political-party campaign, the most flagrant abuse of political power that has been manifested in the lifetime of this country.

Again, when this treaty is presented he would be no respecter of any political party but his own. He will in the same way take every power of the Government available in every department of the Executive, with every dollar of appropriation that can be had from this Congress, and use them in a drive against the Senate to ratify the treaty presented without exercising its own judgment in any essential particular. The people are debauched by their own money.

I say, Mr. President, if this appropriation were limited to the necessitous cases in France, Belgium, and Serbia, for the Armenian, the Syrian, or the Polish needy, or other friendly unfortunate races, parts of the submerged nations of history of long ago, and excluded specifically all parts of Russia under the control of the Bolshevist government and Germany and the allies of the central powers, I would have no objection to it, although I think it is time to call a halt even then. We must look after our own households. We have reached the point, unfortunately, where we can not make these appropriations forever.

Taxes are mounting rapidly, until we have reached almost the limit of the taxpayers' ability. Many a small business today is in doubt whether it can run another 12 months. With taxes accumulating, with the difficulty of help, with the inability to get their men out of the Army to return to private occupations, they are almost in a condition, the average-sized concern of a million dollars or so, to retire from business. They can not readjust their affairs from a war to a peace level. Unless something is done to relieve these burdens, and done promptly, not next year, nothing will be able to survive the financial cataclysm but the very largest concerns, and they in turn will be seized by the Government, and then the revolution preached by Trotzky and hinted at by the President and some of his appointees will be complete.

I have taken this time, Mr. President, because the American people must awaken to the gravity of the issues involved. It is time for plain speaking. It is time to describe the Socialist and all his allied people and political ownership of utilities in plain language. The issue will frame itself, and it will call upon the best thought there is in both political parties to stem the tide that is even now running high both at home and with our Executive abroad.

I ask that the documents from which I have read may be printed at length in the RECORD without my reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PETROGRAD SOVIET WILL PICK HUSBANDS FOR WOMEN.

LONDON, January 4, 1919.

The town council of Petrograd, according to an exchange telegraph dispatch from Copenhagen, has decided that all unmarried women between the ages of 18 and 45 shall be provided with husbands selected by the council. The children of these unions, it is added, will not be allowed to remain with their parents, but will be educated under the control of the Soviet government.

RUSSIAN ECONOMIC LEAGUE.

The Russian Economic League, founded by Russian business men at present living in New York, learns from newspaper reports with deep feeling of anguish and regret of the proposal to admit to the peace conference as representatives of Russia the agents of the so-called Bolshevist "government."

Such an act of unfriendliness toward all loyal and true to the allies' elements of the Russian people can be explained in two ways only: Either by a monstrous misunderstanding or by an intentional unwillingness on the part of the authors of this proposal even in some future time to see Russia great again, united and free, instead of divided, weakened, and deprived of significance and a worthy voice among the nations of the world.

The league indignantly rejects the thought even of the possibility of this last explanation being the true one and can only adhere to the first one, namely, an astounding ignorance of the world's public opinion as to the real nature of Russian Bolshevism.

The league finds it necessary, first of all, to point out the significant fact that all such persons as come forward with praise to Bolshevist ideas invariably start with the emphatic assurance that they themselves are not Bolsheviks.

This phenomena, of course, has its roots either in the desire to emphasize their supposed disinterestedness or in the tacit avowal of exceptional baseness combined with that Bolshevism, which for other reasons the advocates of Bolshevism are eager to exculpate and to exalt.

In Bolshevism it is necessary to distinguish two different sides; firstly, phraseology; and, secondly, an indescribably abominable practice.

There is no denying the exceptional talents of the leaders of Bolshevism in phraseology. Having been for scores of years put aside from practical work by the Russian Imperial Government, the Russian revolutionary workers have to an extraordinary degree developed their faculties in the use of speech.

The building up of theoretical schemes of universal happiness on earth, although these schemes absolutely disagree with the real conditions of life and actually contradict them, being at the same time, however, of extraordinary beauty and enticement, is no doubt one of the foremost qualities of the Russian Bolshevik theorists.

It can not be denied that some of them believe in the Utopia they themselves have created. Even more, their almost religious belief in their own doctrines has led them into the abyss of moral degradation in which they have fallen, dragging down with them our entire great country.

The trouble was, when they reached a position making it practically possible for them to realize their ideals they encountered the fact that actually all the educated classes in Russia were in the camp of their adversaries.

They, however, did not for a moment doubt the righteousness of their theoretical inventions and did not hesitate to quiet their conscience with the accusation of the Russian intelligent classes in what they said was egotism of class and to begin to make Russia happy on the Bolshevist plan, against the will of the majority.

This first deal with conscience was the beginning of the moral downfall of Bolshevism

Encountering the firm refusal of the educated class of Russia to abet communistic exeprimentalizing, they could do nothing else but begin speculating on the very lowest instinct of the population and to seek the support of the scum of the people of everything morally weak or even openly criminal.

In fact, the ranks of Bolshevism and its camouflage, the Soviets, did not only include in corpore the whole of the so-called "black hundred" and the hideous agents of political research, but all such people as had an irresistible desire for a fat living without the corresponding work and talents, all who had long ago lost their conscience.

Among this gang, composed of the scum of human society, the Bolshevist theorists entirely disappear. It is left to them to write flyleafs, which are styled decrees of the Russian Government, but which are put into practice only inasmuch as they serve to sanctify the beastly appetites of the Bolshevist masses.

This literature of decrees, as well as the diplomatic overtures of the Bolsheviks serve only for catching the simple-minded foreigners who can not grasp the idea that anybody could go so far in prostituting human thoughts and words, as is done by the Bolshevik leaders.

The practical work of the Bolsheviks, as it appears in Russia, is done not by them but by more "businesslike" elements of the Bolshevist party.

The theorists bluff the world with the highness of their ideals and the practitioners in the meantime organize the all-Russian gangs of thieves and robbers.

The theorists in their irresistible thirst for power try to build the ideological fundament under the destructive work they do in order to satisfy their political ambitions, and the practitioners under the banging of highly socialistic and "democratic" watchwords build up from their lines a new class of bourgeoisie, only one having for basis of its riches not labor and talent, but the most open-faced robbery.

There is some reason for the singular new "sport on sables," which has spread in places where the Bolshevist government has been liquidated. The population of these places makes a regular occupation of systematic shooting of the fleeing Bolsheviks, explaining this sport by the words that it is more profitable to kill a Bolshevik than a sable, as unfailingly he has on his person not less than 10,000 to 20,000 roubles, and sometimes much more.

The public opinion of the world, fascinated as it is by the revolutionary phraseology of the Bolshevist theorists, is not inclined to heed the lessons of history. The phenomenon of Bolshevism, such as it really is and not such as it is depicted by the theorists, is not new to the world. Toward the end of the French Revolution and before the coming of Napoleon France was likewise infected by gangs of robbers, and these gangs also hid themselves behind the banners of beautified politics. The only difference is that the French Bolshevists did not have talented organizers uniting their forces and justifying in theory robbery and violence. France brought forth not a Trotsky but a Napoleon.

In spite of the high-flowing revolutionary phrases, or rather under their roar, the Russian people have been so much "liberated" from all rights, not only political ones but the very elementary human rights, that with good reason they begin to recall to memory even the Czar's régime as something that is worthy of envy and regret, as a lost paradise.

It needs only a slight impulse to see Russia drop back into the most violent reaction.

The Russian Economic League can not, of course, make so light of historical events as to satisfy itself with an explanation that a licentious mob composed of the scum of the town populations has found leaders and ideologists full of temper and talent.

There can be no denial that the causes of sympathies for Bolshevism root much deeper than this in the great mistakes and even crimes of the bourgeois order of things (not being, however, connected with the nature of it), in its lack of care for the lower classes, and finally in the cruel sufferings brought on by the war in the perversion of human psychology, in the taste for atrocities raised by the war in the masses, and in their belief in the efficacy of violent methods.

The masses have been attracted to Bolshevism as the representative of the most radical turn of human thought, hoping to escape from the distressing reality into the realm of ultrarevolutionary dreams.

There is no doubt, however, that the happiness of humanity can not be attained by idling and destroying, but only by constructive activity, by incentives to and development of labor, talents, creative genius, and initiative.

The Russian Economic League steadfastly keeps in remembrance the promise of President Wilson to stand by Russia.

Awaiting when and how this help will take form, the Russian Economic League can not but loudly give expression to its sentiment that it could not even imagine that help to Russia could take the form of admitting the theorists of Bolshevism to the world's tribune, from which to preach their corrupting lies, and of allowing the practitioners of Bolshevism "a breathing space" for the further strengthening of their "organization."

The Russian Economic League can not forget that as attested by the most authoritative observers of Russian life, who personally took part in the heroic struggle with the Bolsheviks and the Germans, a military force of 10,000 to 20,000 disciplined and suitably provided men would have sufficed to take Moscow last summer, and that the same object now requires over 150,000 men.

The Russian Economic League considers it its civic duty to the allies once more to remind them of the handwriting on the wall: Russian Bolshevism is a danger to the civilization of the world.

The experience of the Russian political parties who tried to treat Bolshevism as a certain kind of honest political creed, which can be made compromises with and can be opposed by parliamentary means, has, in the opinion of the Russian Economic League, shown only too clearly by the tragic end of the Russian Empire that Bolshevism can not exist at the same time as civilization and democratic ideals.

For Russia the last days are nearing when the help of the world's democracies may still be able to save for her the idea of democracy.

Russia, by the efforts of the Bolsheviks, is already brought to the threshold of the most sweeping reaction, and, following upon this, of such international combinations, which will essentially oppose and menace the interests of really democratic nations.

CHICAGO, ILL., November 2, 1918.

To the CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

SIRS: The world is shaken to its foundations. Everywhere the people are rising. Revolution has swept Russia; Bulgaria, Austria, and Germany are in its grip. The Socialists of England, France, and Italy speak with increasing authority. We are witnessing the birth of a new world. The Socialist Party of the United States is a part of the international socialist movement. As such, we speak to you in the interest of the workers of the United States and of the world.

The opportunity for peace is here. We demand that the imperialistic and reactionary forces in our own and allied countries shall not be allowed to impose such terms and conditions as will make the acceptance of the proposed armistice impossible by either the governments or the peoples of the enemy countries.

1. We demand that in the coming peace the principle of self-determination of peoples be asserted to the fullest degree, with the right of all subject peoples and races of both the central and the allied powers to determine the conditions of their own existence.

2. We demand that the peoples of Russia have complete freedom to solve their internal problems, and that the integrity of Russian territory, as well as that of Finland, the Baltic Provinces, Poland, Lithuania, Ukraine, and the other border Provinces, be preserved.

3. We demand that the present preliminary and all subsequent peace negotiations be conducted with the strictest observance of the principle of open covenants of peace arrived at publicly.

4. We demand that duly accredited representatives of subject peoples and of the economic and political organizations of the working classes in all countries participate in the final peace conference.

5. We demand that passports be granted representatives of labor and socialist groups to attend international conferences for the exchange of opinions between the labor groups of the belligerent and neutral nations.

6. We demand that this Government refuse to consider any proposal for economic war after the war.

Respectfully, yours,
THE NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, SOCIALIST PARTY, ADOLPH GERMER, National Executive Secretary.

ALLIES ADOPT WILSON PLAN TO AID RUSSIANS—RECOGNIZE REVOLUTION—CONCEDE RUSSIA'S RIGHT TO SETTLE AFFAIRS—REGARDED AS FRIENDS—SOVIET ASKED TO MAKE TRUCE AND CONFERENCE WITH ALLIES—ALL FACTIONS TO BE HEARD—PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL, APPROVED BY SUPREME COUNCIL, DISOWNS DESIRE TO EXPLOIT RUSSIANS AND EXPRESSES WILLINGNESS TO HELP THEM "IN ANY WAY THEY ARE WILLING TO BE HELPED"—ALLIES TO SEND COMMISSION TO POLAND—UNITED STATES ALSO BEING REPRESENTED.

PARIS, January 22.

Led by President Wilson, the supreme council of the great powers today moved to unite the factions of distracted Russia and bring them into the peace congress.

They unanimously adopted a proposition brought forward by President Wilson asking all the Russian factions, including the Bolshevists, to meet the allied and associated governments at Princes Islands, in the Sea of Marmora, on February 15, the contending factions meantime declaring a truce and suspending all military operations.

MAY SEND PERSHING.

The joint commission of the associated governments will be announced as soon as the Russian factions accept the proposal, which was communicated to them by wireless to-night. The Russian commission will proceed to the meeting place, probably on a warship, by way of the Black Sea and the Bosporus.

Gen. John J. Pershing, the American commander in chief, has been called to Paris and it is expected that he will be the military member of the American representatives of the joint commission.

WILSON TAKES LEADERSHIP.

Aside from the importance of the conclusions reached, it was especially notable as being the first time that the voice of the United States had taken the direction in the concert of European powers on the most serious European question now presented. There was added significance in the fact that an American President in person had taken leadership in the council, made up chiefly of European statesmen, and had pointed a way which they had unanimously adopted.

The final result came after three days of continuous discussion of Russia, which did not crystallize until the final hours, when President Wilson presented in writing the plan he had elaborated.

There was little opposition, and this was based mainly on doubts as to whether the proposition would be accepted.

FOUR CONDITIONS OF PEACE.

In reply it was pointed out that the contending factions were well-nigh at the end of their resources and that their needs likely would lead them at last to a combined appeal to the associated powers.

Besides the definite proposal as given in the communique, the joint commission of the associated powers will lay down four conditions indispensable in bringing about an adjustment. First, peace at all points; second, removal of all economic barriers which restrain the free circulation or exchange of food and commodities between the factional zones and the outside world; third, general elections on a representative basis; and fourth, some adequate arrangement for the payment of debts.

Even if eventually the proposal is not accepted, members of the council expressed the view that their proposition was before the world, and that it would pave the way for such other measures as their own action had brought about.

OUT OF CONTENDING ZONE.

The Princes Islands were chosen for the eventful meeting because they are outside the zone of any of the contending factions. They are also allied headquarters, and are not open to be obnoxious to any of the factions as would be other points, having better material facilities for the meeting.

February 15 was designated as the time of the meeting, so as to give time for representatives to come from the remotest sections of Siberia and other distant localities.

Besides the decisive action taken with regard to Russia, the council to-day also provided a joint commission of two each from the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy to proceed immediately to Danzig and Warsaw for consideration of the entire military, economic, and political situation of Poland.

A plenary meeting of the full conference was announced for next Saturday, when the plans of President Wilson and David Lloyd George, the British prime minister, dealing with a league of nations will be the first order of business.

To-day's action on Russia and Poland, however, goes into effect without presentation to the full conference, and is taken as the action of the great powers.

RESULT OF MORNING SESSION.

These announcements were made in the official statement of the morning proceedings of the council, which reads:

"The supreme interallied war council met this morning at 11 o'clock at the ministry for foreign affairs. The President of the United States of America and the prime ministers and ministers for foreign affairs of the allied and associated powers, as well as Baron Makino, and Baron Matsui, the Japanese delegates, considered the Polish question, on which they consulted Marshal Foch. They decided to send at once to Poland a mission composed of two delegates, one civil and the other military, of the United States, the British Empire, France, and Italy.

"The ministers then resumed the examination of the Russian question, and President Wilson read a proposal which will be discussed this afternoon. The meeting will take place at 3 o'clock.

AT THE MORNING COUNCIL.

When the supreme council of the peace conference met this morning there were present, in addition to all the members of the council, Marshal Foch, the allied commander in chief; Gen. Weygand, his chief of staff; and Rear Admiral Hope, deputy first sea lord of the British Admiralty Board.

W. F. Massey, the premier of New Zealand, was present with the council for a short time.

ITALY DISCUSSES CLAIMS.

The Italian delegation to the peace conference held a conference to-day with Gen. Diaz, the Italian commander in chief, who arrived in Paris to-day to discuss Italy's aspirations from a military and strategic point of view, with special attention to the possession of what the Italians call "the keys of the doors on land and sea."

To realize this object the Italian delegates, it is said, consider it indispensable that Italy possess the Brenner Pass and also the Dalmatian coast and Zara and Sebenico. Without this territory they say it is impossible for Italy to control the Adriatic, as otherwise the coast line of central Italy would be at the mercy of any nation possessing Dalmatia.

WILSON'S PROPOSAL ON SITUATION IN RUSSIA.

PARIS, January 22.

The full text of the official communication issued by the supreme council this afternoon reads:

"The President of the United States, the prime ministers and the foreign ministers of the allied and associated powers, and the Japanese representatives met at the Quai d'Orsay between 3 and 5.30 this afternoon and approved the proposal of President Wilson, which reads as follows:

"The single object the representatives of the associated powers have had in mind in their discussions of the course they should pursue with regard to Russia has been to help the Russian people—not to hinder them or to interfere in any manner with their right to settle their own affairs in their own way.

RUSSIAN PEOPLE FRIENDS.

"They regard the Russian people as their friends, not their enemies, and are willing to help them in any way they are willing to be helped. It is clear to them that the troubles and distrust of the Russian people will steadily increase, hunger and privation of every kind become more and more acute, more and more widespread, and more and more impossible to relieve unless order is restored and normal conditions of labor, trade, and transportation once more created, and they are seeking some way in which to assist the Russian people to establish order.

"They recognize the absolute right of the Russian people to direct their own affairs without dictation or direction of any kind from outside. They do not wish to exploit or make use of Russia in any way.

RECOGNIZE REVOLUTION.

"They recognize the revolution without reservation and will in no way and in no circumstances aid or give countenance to any attempt at a counterrevolution.

"It is not their wish or purpose to favor or assist any one of the organized groups now contending for the leadership and guidance of Russia as against the others. Their sole and sincere purpose is to do what they can to bring Russia peace and an opportunity to find her way out of her present troubles.

"The associated powers are now engaged in the solemn and responsible work of establishing the peace of Europe and of the world, and they are keenly alive to the fact that Europe and the world can not be at peace if Russia is not. They recognize and accept it as a duty to serve Russia as generously, as unselfishly, as thoughtfully, as ungrudgingly as they would serve any other friend and ally, and they are ready to render this service in the way that is most acceptable to the Russian people.

INVITE ALL FACTIONS.

In this spirit and with this purpose they have taken the following action: They invite every organized group that is now exercising or attempting to exercise political authority or military control anywhere in Siberia, or within the boundaries of European Russia as they stood before the war just concluded, except in Finland, to send representatives, not exceeding three representatives for each group, to Princes Islands, Sea of Marmora, where they will be met by representatives of the associated powers, provided in the meantime there is a truce of arms amongst the parties invited, and that all armed forces anywhere sent or directed against any people or territory inside the boundaries of European Russia as they stood before the war, or against Finland, or against any people or territory whose autonomous action is in contemplation in the 14 articles upon which the present negotiations are based, shall be meanwhile withdrawn and aggressive military actions cease.

UNDERSTANDING IS SOUGHT.

"These representatives are invited to confer with the representatives of the associated powers in the freest and frankest way, with a view to ascertain the wishes of all sections of the Russian people and bringing about, if possible, some understanding and agreement by which Russia may work out her own purposes and happy, cooperative relations be established between her people and the other peoples of the world.

"A prompt reply to this invitation is requested. Every facility for the journey of the representatives, including transportation across the Black Sea, will be given by the allies, and all the parties concerned are expected to give the same facilities. The representatives will be expected at the place appointed by the 15th of February, 1919."

Mr. KNOX obtained the floor.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me to submit a report from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. KNOX. I yield for that purpose.

DELAWARE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 5354) extending the time for the completion of a bridge across the Delaware River, authorized by an act approved the 24th day of August, 1912, and I submit a report (No. 659) thereon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill. I do not think there will be any objection to it. It simply extends the limit of time for the construction of the bridge, and unless it is passed at this session all the prior construction work will fall. It is a Pennsylvania Railroad bridge over the Delaware River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was, on page 2, lines 2, 3, and 4, to strike out the words "an act extending the time for completion of the bridge across the Delaware River," as provided for in the above act, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the completion of the bridge now in course of construction across the Delaware River, which the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pensylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, were authorized to construct, maintain, and operate by an act entitled "An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River," approved the 24th day of August, 1912; and for which the time of completion thereof was extended until the 24th day of August, 1919, by an act approved the 27th day of December, 1916, be, and the same is hereby, extended for a period of three years from the 24th day of August, 1919: Provided, That in all other respects said bridge shall be completed and shall be maintained and operated in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill extending the time for the completion of the bridge across the Delaware River, authorized by an act entitled 'An act to authorize the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Pennsylvania & Newark Railroad Co., or their successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Delaware River,' approved the 24th day of August, 1912."

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I wish to say only a word in relation to the pending bill. I confess in all my legislative experience I have never been quite so perplexed or found it quite so difficult to make up my mind as to what my duty in the circumstances was. The manner in which this proposition has been presented to Congress has been so inadequate, so vague, and so difficult of clarification that it is hard to feel willing to support it. Still greater, however, would be my unwillingness to fail to vote for a measure, especially a measure for joint action by the allied Governments, agreed upon by the inter-allied council, that, properly clarified and properly carried out, should subserve their common aims in the war. I have, therefore, concluded to cast my vote in favor of the appropriation asked.

My difficulty in reaching this conclusion has been greatly increased by a very grave anxiety as to the possibility of poverty, suffering, and unemployment in our own country, which it is our first duty to prevent, and also by the stupendous taxation it is proposed to impose upon accumulations already depleted and receding under the burden of previous tax levies.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Moses	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Hollis	Myers	Smoot
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Spencer
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Sterling
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Swanson

Gay	McKellar	Sherman	Watson
Hale	McNary	Smith, Ariz.	Weeks
Harding	Martin, Ky.	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Henderson	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.	Wolcott

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] on official business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] are absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I desire in a very few words to give my reasons for supporting the pending bill.

The bill has a double aspect. It may be viewed as strictly a relief measure or it may be viewed as a war measure. I am of the opinion that fundamentally it is a war measure, and I will give my reasons why I have reached this conclusion.

The reconstruction of the map of Europe is necessarily involved in reaching the terms of peace. That arises from the fact that the German Empire, the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and Russia have been broken into fragments. Now, it is the purpose to reconstruct the map of Europe on the basis of nationalism; in other words, that the liberated nations which have been freed by the war shall be recognized as independent States and become members of the family of nations. This is the only plan upon which the reconstruction of Europe can be based and the future peace of the world secured.

Now, we find that in these freed nationalities anarchy exists in a large degree; that Bolshevism in an insidious form has spread into these territories; and, further, we find that this is due to a large extent to the deprivation of food to a condition bordering on starvation. We know also that peace can never be attained until these liberated nationalities are enabled to establish a stable form of government. In other words, we can not proceed further in settling the terms of peace in the present chaotic condition of Europe. There must arise out of this chaotic condition orderly and stable governments founded upon the principle of nationality before we can settle upon the terms of peace.

Now, what is the great obstacle which stands in the way of these States attaining a position of stable government? It is the food question. The only road to orderly government, according to the consensus of opinion of the world, is through the granting of food relief to these freed nationalities. If this be true, then it is only a temporary obstacle which confronts the peace conference to-day, and this obstacle—although it is an important one—can be removed by granting the relief called for by this bill.

It is declared by the President of the United States and by the supreme war council at Paris that food relief is the key to the whole peace problem. Shall we ignore that opinion? If food relief is the key to the peace problem, how can any Senator say that this is not strictly a war measure?

Mr. President, we are not alone with regard to this relief. It is not a proposition coming from us. Oh, no; it comes from our allies. If France, with the economic burdens of four years of war upon her shoulders, if Italy and Great Britain, laboring under similar conditions, are willing to furnish $200,000,000 under these circumstances, will the United States of America refuse to join her allies in this most important step?

Have we reached a time, Mr. President, when we wish to break with our allies, and is this the entering wedge? Oh, I beg Senators to rise to the fact that this is a world war; that we are taking part in a new world order to save civilization and to secure a just and lasting peace. The United States of America has played a most important part in this great drama. Shall we not, Mr. President, see this great enterprise through to the end? Are we going to falter in taking this necessary step in the interest of peace? Are we going to refuse to join our allies in this movement, which they consider as absolutely necessary in order to obtain peace? Are not, Mr. President, the honor of America, our good faith, our position before the world and in the family of nations at stake in this pending bill? I firmly believe that they are.

Oh, when I think of the part that America has played in this, the greatest crisis in the world's history, when I think of her leadership, when I think of the position she occupies to-day, when I realize that she has risen to the highest rank of any nation in the civilized world, I say do not stop now, do not move backward, do not descend from our high plane of nationalism, internationalism, civilization, and liberty.

Mr. President, one word more. It has been asserted that there are constitutional objections to this measure. I do not share in this view. Congress has power to declare war. Congress has power to pass any legislation that is necessary to bring that war to a successful close. Congress has power to pass any legislation which will secure peace; and this legislation plainly and unmistakably is designed to secure peace. In fact, Mr. President, I believe it to be true that unless this relief is granted and similar relief is extended by the allies, it will be impossible to settle the momentous peace problems in the present chaotic condition of the great empires which this war has overthrown.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I want to say just a few words to add my protest to those made this morning by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] against any sort or degree of recognition by the prevailing nations of the world of the Soviet government of Russia, or the Bolsheviki of Russia, which are one and the same.

I am greatly surprised and keenly disappointed that the powers in conference at Paris would consider entering into any negotiations with those people, or recognizing them in any way whatever, or consenting to meet with them on a common plane, even for discussion. I regret beyond expression that they have so consented. The Bolsheviki of Russia, who constitute the Soviet government of Russia, are murderers, thieves, robbers, highwaymen, assassins, rapists, criminals of the worst type. They openly indorse and daily practice every known form of criminality, and I believe they have invented some forms of criminality hitherto unknown. They are the worst criminals the world has ever known. I believe they are even worse than the Germans. They have abolished God. They have declared there is no God. They have declared war on all churches and religions. They have abolished marriage. They have decreed free love. They have decreed that hereafter all women of Russia shall be kept in common, for the common and promiscuous sexual use of all men of Russia, and that all children are to be raised by the State, just like a lot of cattle or pigs are raised by their owner. No child in the future is to know who is its father. All children are to be the wards of the State, to be raised and cared for by the State, and educated in the principles of the Russian Bolsheviki. The home, the fireside, marriage ties, are abolished.

Such doctrines to me are absolutely shocking, repulsive, horrible, and repugnant to my sense of justice, right, and morality; repulsive to every instinct of decency; and I do not believe in extending any recognition whatever to such people. I do not believe they are worthy of it. I do not want any association with such people. I do not think they are entitled to any recognition or consideration; and I am greatly surprised and inexpressibly disappointed that the powers in conference at Paris have consented to deal with them or to recognize them, even in a preliminary way. That act will bring joy to the heart of every I. W. W., every anarchist, every pro-German, every enemy of organized society in the United States. It will cause them to take fresh hope and courage. It will greatly embolden them, and cause them to renew and pursue with increased ardor and determination their efforts, their meetings, their conspiracies, their organization, their plots to overthrow this Government and to overthrow all organized society. They will take new life, hope, and energy. I shall be very sorry if the representatives of the Soviet government of Russia are to be admitted to the peace conference in France or to be considered in any way whatever. In my opinion it would be a blow to orderly government, law and order, civilization, society.

I believe the theory of recognizing such people is radically wrong and inherently improper, and for one I take my stand and set my face against it. Crime should be punished, not recognized or rewarded. Eternal justice demands the punishment of crime. The immutable laws of God demand it; and this world can not be a fit place in which to live unless there is to be some punishment for crime. Criminals should be punished, not taken in arms.

The people of Russia are entitled to no consideration by the prevailing powers of the world. The people of Russia played the part of Benedict Arnold in the European war. At the supreme crisis, when their allies were in dire distress and facing the greatest emergency in the cause for which they were fighting, the people of Russia turned traitor and played the part of Benedict Arnold and deserted their allies, who were fighting for Russia as well as for themselves, and they are entitled to no consideration whatever from the prevailing powers. In my opinion they should be ignored, and especially and all the more so since they have turned to an absolutely criminal form of government, a government which puts a premium on crime, puts crime above honesty, puts infamy above decency, puts anarchy above civilization, and would tear down everything for which the civilization of the world now stands.

I shall be greatly disappointed if the representatives of that sort of people are permitted to enter into any negotiations in regard to the treaty of peace about to be framed or to be heard in any way whatever at the peace conference. If so, I think it will be radically wrong and violative of every principle for which the United States and the entente allies fought and won this war. For one I am against it and can not look upon it with complacency.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out, after the word "statement," in line 8, page 2, the words "for which expended" and to insert the words "of such receipts and expenditures made."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, that does not change an amendment which I offered in the Committee on Appropriations and which was accepted by the committee, but it does clarify the language, and I think it should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the proposed amendment is to an amendment already adopted. The Chair supposes it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I move its reconsideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the reconsideration is agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. I now offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment already agreed to it is proposed to strike out the words "for which expended" and in lieu thereof to insert the words "of such receipts and expenditures made," so that, if amended, it will read:

Provided further, That a report of the receipts, expenditures, and an itemized statement of such receipts and expenditures made under this appropriation shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, that is simply to make clear an amendment heretofore adopted; and I ask that it may be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a few words in explanation of my vote in favor of this bill.

The debate has taken a very wide range, and many subjects not exactly germane to the proposition involved have been discussed. I sympathize to a very large extent with much of the criticism, either express or implied, that has been made during the course of this discussion—criticism of governmental or, perhaps, to be more accurate, administration policies; criticism of the policies of various departments and bureaus of the Government. But, Mr. President, we have before us here a distinct proposition as to whether we shall appropriate $100,000,000 for the purpose of giving relief to the starving and destitute in Europe; not to all of the starving and destitute in Europe, but to those who may be reckoned among our friends; largely to those of proposed new nationalities, as the Czecho-Slovaks and as the people of Poland are supposed to be.

Mr. President, I think we ought to look at the proposition from two aspects: First, the appeal itself, or the form of the appeal, or from whom the appeal comes; and, secondly, the cause for which the appeal is made. On that point I refer to the RECORD and to two or three statements found in the RECORD.

From one of the cablegrams, printed in the RECORD of January 18, I read these words:

Bolshevism is steadily advancing westward, has overwhelmed Poland, and is poisoning Germany. It can not be stopped by force, but it can be stopped by food, and all the leaders with whom I am in conference agree that concerted action in this matter is of immediate and vital importance. The money will not be spent for food for Germany itself, because Germany can buy its food, but it will be spent for financing the movement of food to our real friends in Poland and to the people of the liberated units of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and to our associates in the Balkans. I beg that you will present this matter with all possible urgency and force to the Congress.

These are the words of the President of the United States. Whether we wish it or not, he is our representative now in France for the purposes of the peace conference.

Further, and at another place in the cablegram:

The situation is one of extreme urgency, for foodstuffs must be placed in certain localities within the next 15 or 30 days if human life and order are to be preserved. I therefore request that you should ask Congress to make available to me an immediate appropriation of $100,000,000 for the broad purpose of providing foodstuffs and other urgent supplies.

This also is the language of the President.

Then, from another cablegram I read:

The British are already furnishing from Army stocks food and clothing relief to Serbia and Syria; the Italians to south Austria.

I suppose it is in that portion of Austria where those of Italian nationality are to be found; and they, therefore, are our friends as well as the friends of Italy and the other allies.

The British and French are advancing the money for transport Belgian relief. Allies are willing and anxious to do all they can, and have and will contribute to the full extent of their resources, but must be borne in mind that most of the food must be purchased in the United States, and American money would be used for such purchase and transportation.

This is from a cablegram sent by the American mission.

So, Mr. President, there is the record, or a part of it. Supplementary to this record are the statements made by the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge to the effect that the record as made is the result of conferences and understandings between the representatives of our Government, of which Mr. Hoover is the head, and the representatives of other Governments appointed for the purpose of considering the question of food supply and distribution and affording relief to the hungry and starving outside of Germany.

That being the record, Mr. President, how can I vote against this measure? View as we please the position in which it might place the President of the United States, who makes this urgent appeal, if we should deny it, or the position in which it would place the American mission to the peace conference, or the embarrassment it may cause Mr. Hoover or the representatives associated with him upon the commission to furnish this food supply, the question is whether it does not go further than that and reflect upon the American Nation to refuse or deny this appeal.

I am not so much concerned, Mr. President, whether the $100,000,000 to be appropriated is to be a revolving fund or whether it is to be given as charity. I believe it will be administered where it is needed, and administered in such a way as to help our friends in Poland, in Bohemia, in Austria-Hungary, or elsewhere outside the German Empire or what once was the German Empire.

I think, Mr. President, that the appropriation will be in the interest of peace. The war is not yet over. Peace terms have not been signed. Complications, and desperate complications, may arise out of conditions such as have been described in the matter of food supplies or the want of them. So whether it be a matter of charity or whether it be a matter of policy and expediency I think the appropriation can be supported on either ground and that it will be in the interest of permanent peace.

It is for these reasons, Mr. President, that I shall support the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the vote may be taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	New	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Smoot
Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Spencer

Harding	Myers	Sherman	Wolcott
Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is still necessarily detained from the Senate. He is not yet well enough to attend the sessions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, before a vote is had upon the bill, I want to put in the RECORD a telegram or two as indicating the sources from which comes at least a part of the support that is putting this measure through the Senate. I think the American people, who are the chief parties in interest, are entitled to be much better advised than they are at present of the purposes of this appropriation in the minds of those who are among its most active champions and advocates.

There has been something said already in the discussion of the bill as to the views of Mr. Hoover with reference to the effect of the bill in stabilizing the market of the world in food products. The food products are held in large surplus quantities by certain food dealers in this country and in Europe. The war demands have to a large extent come to an end and they are confronted by a fall of prices, and consequently of the value, of the enormous stores of food which have been accumulated with a view of the demands of war.

I make this assertion, and propose to substantiate it by what seems to me to be sufficient evidence, that the most energetic and virile influence that is promoting the passage of this bill is a desire upon the part of those interested in building the market in food supplies in order that they may not lose the profits which they had expected to make out of the war. I am going to substantiate it by some witnesses who are parties in the case and whose testimony under every rule of law must be accepted as the truth. When a witness testifies against his own interest his testimony is accepted by the court without a question.

Here is a telegram signed John B. Gordon, a great name. I have met Mr. Gordon and I asked him if he was a relative of the great warrior and orator and statesman, John B. Gordon, of Georgia. He told me that he was a grandson of John B. Gordon, who was a cousin of Gen. John B. Gordon.

Mr. John B. Gordon, who writes this telegram, is an employee or official of the Shell Oil Co. He tells me that the Shell Oil Co. is interested in the price of pork products because the price of pork products is the fundamental factor in the market which regulates the price of oil. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] says to me that the Shell Oil Co. is a foreign corporation. I am very glad that he interpolated that remark as indicating to what an extent foreign corporations which have large business interests in the United States are concerned in the passage of this bill.

The telegram is dated New York, January 22, 1919:

Note New York newspapers' Associated Press reports several Senators opposing bill appropriating $100,000,000 for European famine relief. Regret to note these Senators, while undoubtedly actuated by best motives, are in each instance advocating a course of procedure which will work great specific injury to certain classes of their constituents and great general injury to the country at large.

This telegram is transcribed in that miserable style in which the word "stop" or "period" is interpolated throughout, as though one did not know how to punctuate a telegram. It disturbs, somewhat, its continuity.

United States Senator GORE would cause great financial loss to the patriotic hog raiser of Oklahoma, who under stimulus of urgings of Food Administration and United States Department of Agriculture raised a large surplus of hogs, which surplus will have to be marketed at a loss if the $100,000,000 food relief bill does not go through. Senator HARDWICK, of Georgia, would work great injury upon the farmers of Georgia, who have produced large acreages of peanuts, and upon crude cotton seed and peanut mills of Georgia, who have purchased cottonseed and peanuts from the farmers of Georgia upon basis of stabilized prices, because there exists a surplus of vegetable oils in the United States which must be removed by European demand. America is overstocked and can not absorb the abnormal surplus which accumulated in response to the appeals of the allies. United States Senator JOHNSON, of California, would bring upon his constituents engaged in the importation and crushing of copra and other oil seeds and the importation of coconut oil great financial loss, because these vegetable oils must compete with cottonseed oil, and if the $100,000,000 food relief bill does not pass the stabilized price of 17½ cents per pound for crude cottonseed oil can not be sustained, because the surplus of cottonseed oil is too great for the American consuming trade to absorb. If cotton seed becomes cheap, then all other vegetable oils must, perforce, become cheap. The honorable Senators from Pennsylvania and Ohio, PENROSE and HARDING—

Evidently he is mistaken about the name of the Senator—who advocate the cause of the American laboring man would work him grave injury, because, as Senator HARDWICK himself has said, high wages can not be paid the American laboring man if food and general commodity prices are suddenly lowered. There exists in the United States at the present time a great surplus of food products built up by the farmers and producers and purchased in part from those producers by holders who paid prices based upon the established valuation placed upon various food commodities by the United States Food Administration, and so interwoven and interlocked are the interests of every farmer and food producer and manufacturer and importer of foods that if injury befalls one that it will affect each and every other member of the great food industry. For instance, if low prices for hogs prevail, then low prices for corn must prevail, and if low prices for corn prevail it follows that wheat must be cheaper, and so on. If the honorable Senators who oppose this bill would seek by true remedial efforts to improve the condition of the American laboring man and remove from American markets the menacing surplus of food products which exists they would immediately agitate a very low rate of freight to Europe in order that American merchants may sell the surplus to Europe and South America in competition with England, which is now combing the world for food supplies. The United States Railroad Administration reveals by its latest report that traffic over American railroads is lessening alarmingly month by month. This shows that unless America is relieved of its surplus of all commodities that the wheels of industry will become gradually stilled and that American industry, the American farmer, and the American food producers, and indirectly the American laborer, in place of receiving great prosperity from after-war trade, as anticipated, will instead receive only misery because of the superabundance of all supplies now in American markets. High prices must prevail until the accumulated surpluses are disposed of at the prices which have prevailed. In the food industry at the present time demoralization prevails. The retailers will not buy because they anticipate lower prices. Producers are therefore overstocked with high-priced goods which they can not sell at lower prices without great financial loss. If the views of the writer as set forth are not clearly enough defined, or if you desire further information, will be glad to come to Washington and again discuss food matters with you in its general phases, for, as previously assured you, we do not look at the situation from a selfish angle, even though our industry will be ruined if present stabilized prices do not prevail, but view the matter broadly, realizing the great significance of pending measures to the future prosperity of our country.

JOHN B. GORDON.

I have no criticism to make of the writer of the telegram, nor of the interests he represents.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that he speaks the sentiment and represents the concerted action of other great interests which are concerned in food products which are to be purchased by this great revolving fund to be taken out of the Treasury and that he is acting in entire good faith and, from his standpoint, for a perfectly legitimate purpose. I have no doubt he believes, as he says, that he is actuated by no selfish motives, notwithstanding the fact that he says if this bill does not pass and the prices go down his industry will be ruined. I have no doubt at all that the writer of this telegram, like many other men who have been absorbed in commercial enterprises, who have had no opportunity to give attention or study to the relations of the Government to the people, the functions and purposes for which the Government is established, believes it is a perfectly legitimate function of Congress to appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States in order to keep these firms and the other interests he mentions from losing upon their investment. That is the proposition which he makes openly. There is no secrecy about it. He undoubtedly thinks he is advancing a patriotic purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator, because I did not observe when he first referred to the telegram, from whom the telegram comes, and who is the sender, and what is his business relationship?

Mr. POINDEXTER. John B. Gordon is his name. He is an official of the Shell Oil Co., one of the greatest oil companies in the world, having very large interests in the Orient and in the United States, and a greater concern, I understand, than the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. BORAH. Did the Senator state to whom the telegram is addressed?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is addressed to me.

It would be very unfortunate if, through a failure to pass this bill, as the writer says, the price of peanuts in Georgia should be lowered for the lack merely of a $100,000,000 appropriation. He says, and evidently he believes, that it is entirely within the functions of Congress to appropriate $100,000,000 out of the Treasury, to use the writer's language, "in order to prevent great financial loss to the patriotic hog raisers of Oklahoma."

Mr. President, to show that this is not just an isolated telegram or a mere incidental act upon the part of an individual, I will read another telegram from the opposite end of the country. I have not the slightest doubt that telegrams of that kind are being sent by various firms through a concerted movement of the kind with which Senators are perfectly familiar.

This is a telegram from Seattle, Wash., which I received this morning. It is signed by the North Pacific Millers' Association, Mr. W. C. Tiffany, secretary. This is a very high-class and entirely reputable organization engaged in one of the great standard industries of the country. But they apparently have, from my standpoint, rather unsound views as to the powers and functions of Congress and the grounds upon which money can be taken out of the Treasury and used to maintain the general level of prices. They say:

Referring to bill making appropriation for food supply now under discussion, we beg to call your attention to the fact that it is very essential that this bill be passed, from the standpoint of the Pacific Northwest. There are about 8,000,000 bushels of wheat in Government reserve storage warehouses on Puget Sound and Columbia River, and a considerably larger quantity in the hands of dealers and farmers which must be moved either as wheat or flour, preferably the latter, so as to make room for anticipated new crop. Farmers, grain dealers, millers all interested in having this appropriation passed promptly. May we not have your cooperation?

NORTH PACIFIC MILLERS' ASSOCIATION,
By W. C. TIFFANY, Secretary.

The millers' association says that the farmers, grain dealers, and millers are all interested. I think probably it is millers in which the writer is more especially interested.

My purpose in reading that telegram, Mr. President, is not to cast any reflection upon the millers' association. My own views as to the functions of the Senate are that we have not any authority to appropriate money to maintain the price of flour, even though it may be a desirable object in itself. Whether it is desirable or not desirable, I do not express an opinion at this time. My purpose in reading this telegram is that, whatever its merits may be, the public, or those of them who can be reached by action or information in the Senate or in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, may have an opportunity of knowing some of the reasons for which $100,000,000 of extraordinary taxes are to be levied upon them.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Will it interrupt the Senator if I should read another statement in connection with his statement or his telegrams on that subject?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all. I shall be very glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I read the statement, as follows:

We also at this time, because of the stimulation of the production of hogs throughout the hog-producing sections of the country, have accumulated in the hands of the packers, by reason of the run on hogs at this particular time of the year, a large surplus that we must work off as we can to Europe, and one of the purposes of Mr. Hoover has been, if possible, to provide a safe and regular drain of such edibles as fats, oils, and cereals that we have a surplus of to Europe.

That is the statement of Mr. Glasgow, who represents Mr. Hoover himself during his absence in Europe.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Idaho has read that statement. I read into the RECORD the other day an extract from a telegram from Mr. Hoover, in which he stated that one of the prime objects of the appropriation was to relieve the congestion in the accumulation of food supplies. The Senator from Virginia shakes his head, but I refer to the RECORD.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I shook my head, Mr. President, because I read every telegram that came from Mr. Hoover, or I thought I did, and I have never seen such a statement in any of those telegrams.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If I could lay my hand on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the date on which the Senator from Virginia introduced telegrams from Mr. Hoover, I would read it again. I once read it in the Senate.

I have here also some telegrams of a different character, as to the need of funds for a purpose very different from that of maintaining the market in peanuts and hogs or of bulling the price of flour, or wheat, or of meat products. I will read them—they are brief—because there was some controversy here the other day as to whether or not the Government had neglected its soldiers who were being demobilized. It is very far from my purpose to indulge in any superheated representations upon that subject, which I know is one which appeals to the sympathies of the people, but it is an undoubted fact that we have been negligent in the matter of providing means for the returning to their homes and the clothing and feeding of soldiers as they are being demobilized. I present a telegram from Seattle, Wash., dated January 24, as follows:

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

What is prospect of early action by Congress to provide adequate funds for men released from military service? Referring to previous appeals on subject, Seattle Chamber of Commerce and Commercial Club is anxious to see legislation which will insure men coming out of Army and Navy sufficient resources to reestablish themselves. Situation now serious and should be remedied without delay.

A. H. RHODES,
President Seattle Chamber of Commerce and Commercial Club.

I present another telegram, dated Seattle, Wash., January 22, which is addressed to my colleague [Mr. JONES], Representatives JOHN F. MILLER, ALBERT JOHNSON, L. H. HADLEY, and myself, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., January 23, 1919.

MILES C. POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

To MILES C. POINDEXTER and WESLEY L. JONES, Senators, and JOHN F. MILLER, ALBERT JOHNSON, and L. H. HADLEY, Representatives: Company A, One hundred and sixty-first Infantry auxiliary protest against the inexcusable delay in payment of soldiers and discharged men and allotments. Many instances among our own men of four to eight months' delay works great hardship; influence very bad; some prompt action must be taken; reds making use of Government's neglect.

FRANK STEELE,
R. W. DODGE.
LOUIS H. LEGG.

I present another telegram on the same subject:

SEATTLE, WASH., January 20, 1919.

Senator MILES POINDEXTER,
Washington, D. C.:

Delay in granting bonuses to discharged soldiers and sailors is becoming unbearable and unexplainable to all citizens with adequate sense of shame, decency, and square dealing. Civic and patriotic organizations of Seattle, representation of 20,000 citizens, urge you to every effort for immediate results. If you can not force action on pending legislation with this in view, amend any appropriation bill under consideration so as to pay every man a bonus of not less than $300 when he is discharged. No excuse for delay, every reason for quick action. Our own men's dependents more deserving than foreigners for whom $100,000,000 is asked.

THOMAS P. REVELLE,
ROBERT L. PROCTOR.
GUSS CASEKY.

Mr. President, as to whether or not our great allies in Europe have welcomed the activities of the American Food Administrator in the matter of the distribution of these funds and of the food to be purchased with them, on which great store has been placed by advocates of the bill, I call attention to a dispatch published in a reliable newspaper in New York—the New York Globe—dated at Paris, December 21, 1918:

A month and a half has elapsed since the armistice was signed, and nothing has been accomplished toward revictualing the populations of Poland, Austria, and Germany.

The difficulty in this matter has been an important detail of organization of an almost personal character. There has been a tendency to sidetrack the old international war committees, which during three years have efficiently assisted in the revictualment of the allied nations in different products.

They are composed (meaning these committees) of men of different nationalities who have worked together and acquired a knowledge of the situation and the resources of Europe.

Their cooperation would be invaluable not only in working out a system for food supply to central and eastern Europe but generally in the negotiations on the settlement of peace problems.

France, Great Britain, and Italy have found these commissions excellent means for negotiations.

The idea of the American authorities has been to abolish these commissions, thus obliterating an important means of understanding between the United States and her allies.

These commissions have prepared a plan for revictualing Poland, Austria, and Germany. This plan was thrust aside by the American food controller.

These propositions (meaning the ones just preceding this) were refused on the ground that such interference was unnecessary, and that the surplus food supplies of the world being American, America should have the whole credit and the single management.

The allies answered that this surplus food of the world was not wholly in the United States; that large supplies of wheat in Australia, South America, and the Ukraine, as well as other supplies elsewhere, were now available. In other words, the allies desired to retain the interallied war organization as a medium of better understanding.

Senators have read numerous dispatches indicating the controversy that occurred in Europe after Mr. Hoover's arrival there as to whether he should be given undivided control of the distribution of food in Europe, and, instead of this proposition tending toward harmony and unity of action among our great allies and ourselves, it is said to have been the cause of disagreement, of estrangement, and, unfortunately, of more or less ill feeling.

The statements of reputable and prominent newspaper correspondents have been published in leading papers of this country to the effect that the Governments of Great Britain, France, and Italy were of the opinion that the insistence of Mr. Hoover in supplanting the food commissions of those countries, which, as stated in the dispatch from which I have just read, had demonstrated their efficiency by the service which they had rendered, was a commercial purpose; that, from their standpoint, his motive was, by expending this money and distributing this food through a United States food controller in the various countries of Europe, to give to the United States the benefit of the good will, the acquaintance, and the trade which would be acquired by the transaction. They looked upon it as an attempt to commercialize a great transaction which was carried forward under the holy name of charity.

Those are some of the circumstances, Mr. President, which surround this insistent demand for an unusual appropriation, and I thought that the American people were entitled to have the information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if he would not think it wise to add, after the name "United States," in lines 3 and 4, the following. I will read the sentence, beginning at line 3, where the language is:

That for the participation of the Government of the United States—in agreement with those governments with which the United States is associated in war.

Then add:

The reason I ask the Senator in charge of the bill that question is because many Senators believe that there is an agreement between the allies and ourselves with reference to this fund. If there is an agreement, I am very glad; if there is no agreement, I think that there ought to be one. Therefore, after the words "United States," in line 4 of the bill, I think it should read:

For the participation by the Government of the United States in agreement with those governments with which the United States is associated in war.

That, I think, would emphasize the construction placed upon the program by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and others. Why should not that language be added?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Michigan will suspend for a moment, the Chair will state that the question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The Senator's amendment would not now be in order, but it would be in order as soon as the amendments which have been made as in Committee of the Whole are concurred in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the predecessor of the present Presiding Officer held that the bill is in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate, but the first question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be in order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It can take that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope those amendments will be submitted separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in doubt as to the question of submitting the amendments separately unless previous notice has been given as to their reservation for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall not insist on it, except that I want the matter put to the Senate without it being stated that "without objection, the amendments are concurred in." I want the question submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. [Putting the question. After a pause.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers	Smoot
Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Spencer
Beckham	Kenyon	New	Sterling
Calder	King	Nugent	Swanson
Colt	Kirby	Overman	Thompson
Culberson	La Follette	Penrose	Trammell
Curtis	Lenroot	Poindexter	Underwood
Fletcher	Lewis	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Ransdell	Walsh
Gay	McKellar	Saulsbury	Warren
Hale	McLean	Shafroth	Watson
Harding	McNary	Sheppard	Weeks
Henderson	Martin, Ky.	Simmons	Wolcott
Hollis	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Johnson, Cal.	Moses	Smith, Mich.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] on business of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BAIRD] on account of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained by illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I understand the question now before the Senate is on concurring in the amendments made to the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Upon that a vive voice vote was taken, whereupon a quorum was called. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] asked to have a separate vote on each amendment. I am not clear in my own mind as to just what the amendments are. In some of those amendments I think there are limitations and extensions of the provisions of this bill. For instance, I think there is an amendment that precludes our devoting any of this charity, if it is a charity, to any of the people of the central powers or their allies. I think I am right about that, and that such an amendment has been adopted.

I do not think it will be a very popular thing to say, but I am going to say that if we are going to treat this as a charitable, generous, and kindly proceeding, I think these limitations reflect a very narrow and revengeful spirit. If I had my way about it, I would strike out the words "outside of Germany." I do not understand how our Government can go out to relieve starvation and distress and in the appropriation bill fix such words of limitation.

One of the most humane things done by the French after the armistice was to take food to the starving children of Austria-Hungary. I think, if my memory serves me right, that 1,000 carloads of food were sent to these misguided people.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My recollection is that that was done under the administration of Mr. Hoover, and not under that of the French.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I think not——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one word. If the Senator refers to the carloads which were shipped from Switzerland into Austria-Hungary, the information which was printed in regard to that stated that it was done under the direction of Mr. Hoover by arrangement with the Swiss Government.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not care who did it; it was done under the guardianship of French soldiers and under the French flag; and it was most generous and distinctly creditable. Lincoln would have done it; Grant was equally generous with his vanquished foe at Appomatox.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have been engaged in a conference on the revenue bill and have just recently come into the Chamber. The amendment referred to by the Senator from Michigan, I will say, was put on at my suggestion. I think it is a sound amendment. I think our first duty is to help the starving people who were reduced to starvation by the people I exclude by my amendment. I think there is a broad distinction between starving friends and starving enemies in a case like this.

I think we should take care of distress in our own country before we begin to feed Germans and Turks. I carefully left in the Armenians, the Syrians, and the Greeks—I enumerated them—and all the Jewish and Christian populations under Turkish sovereignty. All I excluded there were the Turks. I further excluded Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Bulgaria, because I do not think the time has yet come to feed them. I want, first, to feed the people whom they brought to starvation, and when that is done, if there is money left, we can feed the others.

I wanted also, I may say to Senators, to save and help this bill and not carry it beyond the point at which Senators can vote for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not criticizing the Senator from Massachusetts. I find myself in accord with him most of the time. What I dislike about it is to read into a statute an affirmative limitation of that character when it is not necessary.

Mr. LODGE. There was already a limitation in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; therefore the amendment of the Senator was appropriate, and I would strike out the House provision.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean that he would feed the Germans, too?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not necessarily; but I would leave that to the President in his discretion. Can we not trust him? The bill reads:

and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President from time to time.

I would leave it to the President to determine from time to time. In other words, I dislike very much to chisel into the statute a limitation which in future years may come back to plague us. Our first consideration should be for our own people whose Government we represent; then if there are starving children anywhere and we can feed them it will be to our everlasting credit to do so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that any limitation which we put on the statute will not disturb Mr. Hoover one particle.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not thinking about Mr. Hoover. He seems amply able to take care of himself.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Hoover, who violated the most fundamental principles of the Constitution of this country, will not have very much regard for a statute in Europe.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not worrying about Mr. Hoover. History may give him his proper credit and his rightful place.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan will allow me, I entirely agree with the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I do not think Mr. Hoover will pay the slightest attention to the terms of the statute. He was entirely lawless here. He undertook to abolish by his decree the laws of States, with which he had nothing more to do than the Sultan of Turkey, and he will not regard these limitations. I think, however, for our own purposes, our own good sense, and in deference, I believe, to the wishes of the people of the United States, we had better not begin feeding the Germans and those associated with them in the war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That may be the view of the people of the United States now, but I wish to tell you that when you write affirmatively into a statute the exclusion of innocent children in any part of the world from our sympathetic consideration you take a very great responsibility. I am not thinking about Mr. Hoover violating the Constitution. I do not expect him to do it; but I am thinking of my vote on this bill and the fact that we are going out on an errand of mercy with bread in one hand and a gun in the other. I am willing the President of the United States shall invest this fund as he may be led to do by the circumstances of the situation. I hope it will be used to relieve hunger and starvation wherever it exists.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has referred to the innocent children of Germany. Would he object to having another hundred million dollars added to this bill to take care of the starving children in America?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I would vote for that.

Mr. PENROSE. Including the children of the great city of New York, who, on account of the high price of milk, are gradually losing their vitality and their strength?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I would vote for that kind of a resolution and to relieve starvation.

Mr. PENROSE. Had the Senator not better vote for that before he votes for this?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I fear I will not have the opportunity, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Then let him vote against this until he has a chance to vote for the other.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; I am going to vote for this because I think that the President of the United States has committed our country to it. He is the Commander in Chief and on the ground; the war is not ended; and the President says that this measure of relief is essential to obtain a general peace. Having committed our Government to it by what I call an agreement with the other nations, I refuse to repudiate him when he is at the peace table taking most of the responsibility that grows out of this very unfortunate and yet very serious situation.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a correction there, the rather time-worn argument of the war for waste and extravagance and the rather overworked argument of "Commander in Chief" for ill-advised projects and chimerical enterprises are in this case supplanted by the argument of "our ambassador and minister plenipotentiary." Mr. Wilson is the ambassador of the United States by his own appointment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, whatever he is, he is President of the United States, and he is the only President we have. I did not help make him President, and I do not approve of very much he has done while he has been President; but I am not going to repudiate him when he is upon foreign soil as the representative of the American people; and I think anything that will tend to wither his arm and lessen his usefulness there will be disgraceful to the American people.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator carry that policy so far as to adopt any proposition of a league of nations he may bring back on the theory that he is our President and the only President we have?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; I do not regard that as imperative or so humane as feeding the starving people of Europe. I am not in accord with a great deal that he is trying to do and has done; but, nevertheless, I think we can not afford to make a serious international blunder. I think this language, "outside of Germany," will come back to plague our country in future years. If we are going to relieve distress, let us do it in a big, broad, charitable, kindly, sympathetic way, and not build hurdles of hatred for future generations to mount.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator spoke of supporting this measure because the President is Commander in Chief. The only thing that is said about "Commander in Chief" in the Constitution is that the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; the war is not over; peace has not been declared.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, if the Senator will pardon me just a second, I want to ask him a question. Very often, however, the expression is used here in the Senate as though the Senate were a military organization and subject to the commands of a superior military officer and Commander in Chief.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I sometimes think it is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. One would think so, if the Senator will pardon me, from the remarks he has just made.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. One would think so from the course that the Senate has taken upon most of the legislation demanded by the Executive.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Exactly. I agree with the Senator in that regard; but what I wanted to ask the Senator was this: Does the Senator believe that because the President is Commander in Chief, whatever he is Commander in Chief of, the Senate of the United States has to vote appropriations out of the Public Treasury whenever he tells it to do so?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I do not think so; but it usually does, and this is a poor time and a bad place to stop.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The argument of the Senator was that we ought to support this bill because the President asked for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is this bill. That is not some other bill. That is this bill. I am talking about this one originating with the interallied war council in France.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am talking about this one.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And I am talking about a bill intended to relieve starvation and distress, which the President says is vital to peace and the end of war. That is what I am talking about.

There is a great deal of talk in the Senate Chamber that I do not agree with. I listen to it. I listened this morning to a tirade against Russia with which I entirely disagree. How short the memory of Senators is. Not long ago the Russians with 6,000,000 men upon the eastern front performed a service for mankind for which the world ought to be grateful. The Russians held Germany for months and prevented concentration of her army in France.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I decline to yield. I heard the Senator this morning, and I so thoroughly disagree with him that I do not want to invite any controversy. Senators talk about disorder in Russia. Of course there is disorder; but when there was almost equal disorder here in our own country, and brothers were at the throat of brothers in civil war, it was Russia, with its potential and mighty influence, which helped save the country of Abraham Lincoln from destruction.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am afraid if I yield to the Senator from Washington I will be guilty of invidious discrimination. I did not refuse to yield to the Senator from Montana merely because we were in disagreement; and if I yield to the Senator from Washington of course I am going to yield to the Senator from Montana also.

I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I join with the distinguished Senator from Michigan in his compliment to the part that Russia played as an ally of Great Britain and France in the early years of the war; but my understanding of the speech of the Senator from Montana this morning was not that he criticized the efforts of Russia in support of the allies. What he was criticizing was the element of the Russian people which got control of the Government and by force, by murder, by brigandage, by loot, by opening the prisons to the desperate criminals that were confined in them and putting guns in their hands, betrayed the Russian people, surrendered a large portion of the Russian territory, and turned over the gold in the public treasury to their German masters and employers. I understand that he was denouncing, not the Russian people who aided the allies but the Bolsheviki anarchists who betrayed the allies. Now, I am sure the Senator from Michigan does not like the Bolsheviki.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have heard this idle talk around this Chamber for several days. I have heard it said by able Senators that not a dollar of this money should go to relieve distress in Russia; and yet when our ambassador at the Court of St. James pleaded for the discontinuance of the construction of privateers with which the government of Mr. Lincoln was to be destroyed it was the Government of Russia that sent a fleet into American waters under sealed instructions to go to the relief of Mr. Lincoln and his government. I have read every paper that passed between our State Department and our ambassador bearing upon that question years ago, and I commend that correspondence to the people who are criticizing Russia to-day.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly yield to a question from me now?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator from Michigan have high esteem for Benedict Arnold, who rendered most valiant service to the American cause at Quebec, Champlain, Ticonderoga, and other places, notwithstanding the fact that he later betrayed the cause which had honored him with a commission?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is talking about an American. I am not talking about Russians. I do not think Trotsky is a Russian. I do not think Lenine is a Russian. I am talking about the Russian people, God bless them, who need strength and comfort and help. I am talking of the Russian people; and I have not lost faith that they will yet work out a noble destiny, dreadful as their experience has been.

No; I abhor bolshevism, but the Russians will throw it off and stabilize their Government, in my opinion.

One thing Russia did do. They kept Germany busy on the eastern front while England was getting ready to go to the aid of Belgium and France; and if they need help I am going to give the President of the United States the funds and the right to help them. The mere fact that they are having an unfortunate political experience with cutthroats and assassins is no reason why they should be deserted by their historic friends.

I know what the sealed orders were that were given to the Russian fleet, and I know the effect that the sailing of that fleet for American waters had upon our enemy at that time. What no other influence could do the sailing of the Russian fleet accomplished. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, the eminent divine, told me that while he was a guest in the palace at Petrograd he was shown the original orders given to that fleet. I want to say to Senators on both sides of the Chamber that Russia rendered a potential service to our country when we were sorely driven and at our very wits' end to control the disorder and Civil War within our own country, and as one American Senator I refuse to forget that service.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Nobody can dispute the propositions laid down by the Senator from Michigan in regard to the conduct of Russia during our Civil War. Everybody understands that; but I can not see what that has to do with the existing situation. The Senator undoubtedly sees a difference between ordered government and established institutions and institutions that are absolutely under the control of anarchy and of riot and of disorder, where wreck and death are the only order recognized by these people.

Now, the Senator, of course, does not want to feed the very men who are to-day shooting down American soldiers on Russian territory, and that is precisely what I object to. We know that if food were to be sent there, that food would be taken charge of by the red-handed anarchists and the Bolsheviki that are in control of the Russian Government at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is right—not usually wrong. I do not want to feed anyone who is shooting at an American soldier. There are millions of noncombatants in Russia. I suppose there are millions of them in Hungary and Austria and Germany. I do not want to say where this food shall go. I want to leave it to the President. I do not want to chisel into the statute something that we may regret. Some one has said, "That which hath been written shall remain, nor be erased, nor written o'er again."

This resolution, if enacted into law, will go down the ages; and I would rather that sentence would be out of it than in it. The fact that countries are at war does not mean that they will not at some time be at peace with each other. Why, our principal ally was once our enemy and at war with us. Russia and Japan were lately at war, yet they came to be friends. I do not like to write into the statute a declaration that money appropriated by the American Government for the relief of suffering and starvation shall not be used in certain territory, no matter what the suffering may be; that is the extent of my contention. I do not say to whom it shall go. I am not undertaking to direct the expenditure. I will leave it to the President.

Out here at Cabin John Bridge the name of Jefferson Davis was carved as Secretary of War at the time the bridge was constructed. During the War of the Rebellion some one went up and chiseled Davis's name out, and the scar was worse than the name, caused more talk and much animosity. Col. Roosevelt, while President, restored it, to his great credit. Revenge is a poor guide for men or nations.

I do not want to prolong this discussion. I have no intention of doing so. I did not intend to say anything about the bill. I think the limitations in this bill very unfortunate.

Before I take my seat I am going to repeat that I have not lost faith in Russia. Russia has made great progress since the end of the Russian-Japanese war—great progress. Before the Russian-Japanese war there was not a peasant in Russia who owned an acre of land in his own right. Within 10 years after the fall of Port Arthur millions of acres were owned and cultivated by the peasants who owned them. They are not hopeless, and we must not shut our ears and our eyes or our hearts against them. If there is a country in the world, outside of France, that has earned the perpetual gratitude of the American Nation, it is Russia. France helped us win the Revolution. Russia helped us win the Civil War. I do not want to let go unchallenged the statement that I have heard to-day several times, that none of this money must go to the relief of the Russians, just because a few scoundrels have assumed leadership there—temporary leadership, I hope.

I do not want anybody to misunderstand me. I am not going to overlook our friends and proceed immediately to the camps of our enemies to distribute these foodstuffs; but I am going to leave that to the President, as the bill does stripped of its limitations.

Will not that be better, Senators? Will not that look better a quarter of a century hence? Perhaps, when Germany may become a republic and our relations may become as close to her as they are to England now, it will not look very well to have this historic statute say that none of the money appropriated by this Government to feed the hungry and the starving in Europe shall be used in Germany.

We strongly condemned Germany because she would not feed the innocent children of Belgium when Germany was at war with Belgium; and yet here, two months after the armistice has been signed, when Germany is broken and her military strength destroyed, we solemnly assert that though her children be starving, none of this food shall be given to them. Is the world mad? That does not sound well to me.

I am not going to delay this bill by taking another moment of time. I again appeal to the Senator from Virginia to state whether or not he is willing to write into the bill the words "in agreement with those Governments with which the United States is associated in war," so that the sentence will read:

That for the participation by the Government of the United States—in agreement with those governments with which the United States is associated in war in the furnishing of foodstuffs and other urgent supplies.

And, then, my language—

I think that will tend to remove the uncertainty as to whether this is a formal agreement between these powers. It will make a substantial basis for the return of the money we are appropriating; but if the Senator from Virginia disagrees with me, and the Committee on Appropriations disagrees with me, I will not press the matter. I think it ought to be in the bill; and I think the limitations ought to be out of the bill. The whole subject matter ought to be turned over to the President, without such limitations as will come back to plague us in the future.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the only amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, as I understand, is to interline after the word "participation" the words "in agreement with other Governments."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. "In agreement with other Governments." I would stop there, if necessary.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator has very generously said that if I did not feel that I could accept that amendment he would not press it further. I will say to him that the amendment is entirely unnecessary, because there has been an agreement between other Governments. Each of the four Governments has appointed two of its most distinguished statesmen to distribute this fund. The council for supply and relief agreed with the allied war council that $300,000,000 should be raised to relieve the starving populations of Europe. That has been in the RECORD here. That agreement has been reached. Each of the four nations appointed two representatives. Lord Reading and another distinguished Englishman are on it for Great Britain. Two of the most distinguished men in France are on it. In the case of Italy, I forget the names; I can not carry these foreign names in my head; but the four Governments are all represented on what they call the supreme council of supply and relief, and they have agreed that it must raise $300,000,000 to relieve the suffering people, and they have asked the people of the United States to furnish $100,000,000 of the $300,000,000. So there is an ample agreement, and it is already being attended to by a council of eight of the leading statesmen of Europe; and for that reason I think it would simply lead to confusion to change the law. It certainly can do no good, because the agreement has been arrived at, and eight of the leading statesmen of these four countries are at work trying to relieve the starvation among our friends in Europe.

I think, therefore, it is unnecessary to add that language to the bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words in regard to some of the remarks which were made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Germany started and waged the most infamous, brutal assault upon the civilization of the world that has ever been known. In doing so, the German soldiers, who are from and of the German people, perpetrated the most monstrous, horrible, shocking, and blood-curdling outrages upon the people of France and Belgium that have even been known in the annals of history. Nothing like it was ever known before.

The people of Germany perpetrated monstrous outrages upon the people of this country, upon the dignity and integrity of this country. They sank the Lusitania, carrying about 200 innocent citizens of the United States, mostly women and children. They sank other merchant ships, ships that belonged to the people of this country, and destroyed lives of other citizens of this country. The people of Germany held celebrations, commemorating with drink and joy and song and speeches those monstrous outrages. Germany tried to corrupt, debase, and poison this country through methods of bribery, treason, and infamy, by means of an infamous propaganda of disloyalty.

The Christian religion and all sound systems of morals and ethics teach that forgiveness is to be extended when there is repentance and contrition. We are taught by Holy Scripture that there is to be forgiveness when there is repentance and contrition and not before. The people of Germany have manifested not one symptom of repentance or contrition for anything they have done in this horrible assault on the civilization of the world. The people of Germany are still stubborn, unrepentant, and defiant. Their spirit is not broken. They do not regard themselves as a conquered, defeated, or beaten people. They still exhibit the belief that they were right in what they did, that they had a right to do it, from the standpoint of the false German philosophy which teaches that might makes right. There is every evidence that they cherish the idea of becoming again a world power and of renewing their monstrous warfare upon the civilization of the world and yet conquering the world and bringing it to their feet.

There is no sound system of religion or morals or ethics which teaches that people are entitled to forgiveness before they manifest repentance, and that is a sound principle. There is justice in it. It is at the bottom of every sound system of theology, morals, and ethics. The Bible teaches it. We are not entitled to forgiveness until we repent of our sins and ask for forgiveness. The German people have not yet manifested one symptom of repentance. They still manifest a stubborn, sullen disposition to stand on what they have done.

When the people of Germany express repentance and contrition for their misdeeds; when they acknowledge that they were wrong in this war; when they acknowledge that they were the cause of bringing on the war and did it willfully and wrongfully; when they acknowledge that they were guilty of monstrous outrages upon innocent men, women, and children, noncombatants, in France and Belgium; when they acknowledge that they were in the wrong in all those things and exhibit a spirit of repentance and contrition and a disposition to make reparation for those wrongs and a willingness to make a beginning at making reparation, I say it will be time enough for the people of the United States to extend to them forgiveness, generosity, and charity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator does not understand that I am in a forgiving frame of mind in reference to Germany and the atrocities she has committed?

Mr. MYERS. I say, without any discredit to the Senator's generosity of heart, that if he wants to extend the provisions of this bill to Germany, it seems to me he is in a very forgiving frame of mind. It can not be otherwise.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have not said anything about extending the provisions of the bill to Germany. I simply expressed my opposition to that limitation, leaving it to the President to say where hunger and distress should be relieved. I am not telling him where to go.

Mr. MYERS. No; but striking out "Germany" would leave the food free to go to Germany.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It would leave the matter with the President. The President is in a position to know as much, at least, about the atrocities that have been committed as the Senator and myself. We leave it to him. I do not like to write into the statute such a word. I think it will come back to plague us. I cited the case out here at Cabin John Bridge. To the eternal credit of Col. Theodore Roosevelt, he ordered Jefferson Davis's name recarved on that bridge. I want to say to the Senator what I said a little while ago, that which has been written shall remain, and I would be very slow as to what I would write in a statute, especially when the object of the statute is bounty and generosity to starving people.

Mr. MYERS. That was a very generous and chivalrous act on the part of Mr. Roosevelt, for whom I ever had very great admiration after the outbreak of the European war, admiration for his true citizenship and intense Americanism. The instances are not analogous, however. I do not believe the Senator from Michigan would be in favor of restoring to the campus of the War College, in this city, the statue of Frederick the Great, which was taken down after we entered the European war.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know that I would.

Mr. MYERS. I should not think so. I believe the time for that has not yet come.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know that I would favor restoring that statue, but I would not favor tearing down the one of von Steuben, on Lafayette Square, who helped us in the Revolutionary War.

Mr. MYERS. This is not a question, however, of statues. It is not a matter of sentiment. It is a question of justice. The effect of putting into the bill the idea of the Senator from Michigan, amending it by taking out the name of Germany, would be to give the tacit consent of this body to sending to Germany a part of the food to be provided, if the authorities in charge of the distribution of it should so decide. I believe it is proper to put in the bill a limitation so as to exclude Germany from participation. Congress is the disbursing body of the Government, and it is proper for Congress to say how and where it thinks money appropriated should go. I believe we should keep such a restriction in all such bills, until the people of Germany manifest some repentence, some contrition for the monstrous iniquities and outrages which they have perpetrated upon the people of this country and all the rest of the world; until they manifest a willingness to make some reparation to the victims of their outrageous treatment and brutal conduct. When they do that, when they exhibit genuine repentance and contrition and a disposition to make reparation, I am not one of those who would withhold from them forgiveness, mercy, and charity. Until then I would not be precipitate about extending charity to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair submitted the question, but was in doubt, and before he could again submit the question the absence of a quorum was suggested. He will again put the question on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if I am in order, I wish to address myself to the measure before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that the matter was left hanging, and unless the Senator desires to oppose concurring in the amendments——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Perhaps what I will say will be an argument in favor of it, perhaps it will be an argument against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has been recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I supposed I had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senate is about to vote upon a bill that appropriates $100,000,000 to be expended in Europe as a gratuity. I am unable to regard the pending bill as a measure to promote war or to give my support to it as a war measure. I do not understand that this Government is at present at war with any people on the face of the earth. In a very narrow and technical sense, perhaps, it may be said that a state of war still exists with the central powers, but the last address which the President delivered to Congress gave us, in my judgment, such assurance as his mastery of the language could give us that the war was at an end.

Everybody knows that in a practical, sensible, rational way the war has ended. The armies of the central powers are dissipated, disintegrated, scattered. They have surrendered. Their navies are in the possession of the allies. Their aircraft, their artillery, their transportation service have been turned over so completely that all thought of war is preposterous.

So when anybody advocates this measure as a war measure I think it is reasonable to say that he is talking fiction. By the very terms of the bill not a dollar of the appropriation is to be expended upon the people with whom we have been at war. How, then, can it be called a war measure?

We are not actually and lawfully at war with any people on the face of the earth. If we are making any war at any place we are making it unlawfully and in violation of the Constitution, and if 124 American boys were killed on foreign soil within 48 hours such sacrifice of American lives was made in violation of the Constitution. It was not lawful war, it was murder, and it can not be disguised by any fine phrases.

So, Mr. President, anybody who supports this bill as a war measure, in my judgment, can not find any fact or situation to bring it within any legal definition of a war measure.

It has been somewhat interesting, as a sort of spectator, to follow this discussion. One Senator would take the floor and say he could not support this bill as a war measure, but that he supported it as a peace measure. Another Senator would say that he could not support it as a peace measure, but that out of the bounty of this country he felt it ought to be supported as a measure of charity.

I do not believe there can be found any logical support for it as a peace measure. It is not to be used to make peace with those with whom we have been at war, for according to the terms of the provisions of the bill, no dollar of it is to be expended within the limits of Germany or among or upon any of the peoples with whom we have been at war. How, then, can it be said that it is a peace measure? If we are not to expend a dollar of it upon the people with whom we have been at war, then how can it be a war measure? If we can not expend a dollar of it upon the people with whom we are now making peace, how is it a measure to promote peace?

What, then, is this bill? I do not believe the time has yet come, sir, to discuss any measure before this body upon constitutional grounds. The Constitution has for some time been a lost document. I do not believe the Senate has it sufficiently in view to approach the discussion of this bill in that calm spirit in which constitutional rights and constitutional principles should be discussed.

Is it a measure, Mr. President, to appropriate money for charity? Are any of the Senators on this floor supporting it on the ground that it is for charity? Senators, you must offer some reason, some day, for your support of this appropriation of $100,000,000. Are you supporting it as a war measure, as a peace measure, or are you supporting it as an appropriation for charity?

Think for just a moment of the figure of our good old Uncle Sam dispensing charity to the starving peoples of Europe. Their hands stretched out to him shrunken with hunger and starvation, little children about his knees, pale, emaciated, their hands so thin that you can see through them. For two years a great, large area of that country has existed upon food that lacked most of the elements essential to life, and the people show the wasting effects of this deprivation. Think of that figure which represents the strength and power, and, if we are to believe that this is charity, the benevolence and the philanthropy of this Government. Picture Uncle Sam there with his means of relieving hunger, and he sees stretched out to him the hands of all nationalities.

Charity! Do you tell me it is charity? What is charity? Charity, Mr. President, has no room in its heart for hate or resentment. It is not charity; it can not be charity if it discriminates. Think of charity represented in the person of this figure that stands for American benevolence and philanthropy turning away a starving child because it is of German parentage. Write it into this statute if you will, but if you do you will write in that which in 10 years will make you as an American writhe and cringe in shame that you did it.

Charity, Mr. President, is the very spirit of the Christ life. Charity represents and stands for all the principles of His teachings.

When you remember the greatest act of Grant's life, really the greatest act of his life, what was it? Oh, that magnificent thing which he did at Appomattox. "Take home your horses and your mules, ye men of the South. You will need them for making the spring crop." When the magnificent figure of that knightly man who had led the Southern forces through four years of fighting against this Government leaned across the table to the sturdy, silent man of few words and said, "Gen. Grant, 28,000 of the Confederate soldiers here have not had anything to eat but parched corn for days," what then did the commander of the victorious forces of the Union say to him who stood before him as the representative of the forces which had been seeking to destroy our Government? What was it? Did he say to him, "We have hungry people in the North, and we propose to feed them first. You fellows who have been fighting to destroy the best Government under God's heaven must go hungry for a while." No; the great general who saved this country and this Government said to him, "Bring them in. The Federal commissary is open to them"; and that night 28,000 Confederate soldiers fed at the commissary of the Government which they had fought to destroy.

Mr. President, this is not a measure to prosecute war. It is not a measure to secure peace, and it is not a measure that can be wholly covered by the mantle of charity. A great enveloping mantle is that mantle of charity, but if you scan it closely enough through it you may see the horns and the hoofs of the Beef Trust, and in saying that I am suggesting no duplicity on the part of the President of the United States. As the late lamented Dolliver once said, "he is surrounded by men who know exactly what they want."

Mr. President, just a suggestion and I leave that phase of the case. Who is it you would punish by denying food to the Germans? The Kaiser? Hindenburg? Ludendorff? Hardly. You would punish the millions of German men, women, and children and Austrian men, women, and children, who had no more to do with the bringing on of this war than you had, not a bit. Do you think it is straining to assert that? Listen:

We have no quarrel with the German people—

Treason? No. Listen:

We have no quarrel with the German people; we have no feeling for them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval.

Who said these words? Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States.

Then, Mr. President, why not supply these peoples? Why starve them? Who said those words? Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States. Out of fashion, are they? Perhaps so. But he said more. Listen:

We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people and shall desire nothing so much as the early reestablishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us, however hard it may be for them, for the time being, to believe that this is spoken from our hearts.

And again:

You catch with me the voices of humanity that are in the air. They grow daily more audible, more articulate, more persuasive—

Mark you, Mr. President, "the voices of humanity that are in the air" grow daily "more persuasive." I am sure the Senate desires to hear what the President said, so I shall read from the beginning of the paragraph.

You catch with me the voices of humanity that are in the air. They grow daily more audible, more articulate, more persuasive, and they come from the hearts of men everywhere. They insist that the war shall not end in vindictive action of any kind; that no nation or people shall be robbed or punished because the irresponsible rulers of a single country have themselves done deep and abominable wrong. It is this thought that has been expressed in the formula, "No annexations, no contributions, no punitive indemnities."

When the President uttered those words long months after we had entered the war, uttered them as an assurance to the German people as to what they might expect if they would weaken in their support of the Kaiser's Government, he was distinguishing between the German people and the Kaiser's Government. I do not think you will find anywhere anybody who will stand up in defense of anything that junkerdom in Germany or junkerdom in any other country has been guilty of in connection with the present war. But there is a difference between the responsibility of the people who were a part of the Government—a helpless part of it—and were forced into a war, and those who were in control and are responsible for the war. I think the time has come to make the discrimination.

Mr. President I understand perfectly well what we are about to do. Mrs. Jameson has said:

I have much more confidence in the charity which begins at home and diverges into a large humanity than in the world-wide philanthropy which begins at the outside of our horizon to converge into egotism.

We are about to go on record in support of this appropriation of $100,000,000, for which the people are to be taxed, not according to their wealth—the time to do that has gone by—but we will sell bonds to provide this $100,000,000, and consumption taxes will be levied upon the people of the United States to pay that obligation. I know the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] believes—for he has said it on the floor of the Senate several times since this bill was under consideration—that a considerable portion of this sum will be returned by the governments to which this appropriation is to be doled out by Mr. Hoover on the other side. I read carefully the hearings before the committee, and the best that I could get out of it in support of that proposition was the statement of Mr. Polk that he hoped that 50 per cent of it might be returned as a revolving fund if the governments receiving it appropriated the money to pay back to the United States.

Senators must remember that by the terms of this bill it is not food alone that will be dispensed. Agricultural implements, fertilizer—there are a thousand and one things for which this money can be spent and yet come within the terms of the statute. What are the terms of the proposed statute? "Foodstuffs and other urgent supplies." In the hearings it was admitted that "urgent supplies" means anything Mr. Hoover sees fit to purchase for these people. Put agricultural implements and fertilizer and things of that character into the scale on one side and on the other side let me present to you the conditions in this country, and weigh it a little; consider it a little to-day as you cast your votes for this appropriation.

Mr. President, the Senate should pause and consider the conditions that confront the people of the United States at this hour. There is a situation so grave and so serious menacing our own country at this very moment that it must appeal to the most conservative-minded man in the Chamber to consider well how we shall deal with that situation as it grows upon us—how we shall use the trust funds that are committed to us in the Treasury of the United States.

A few days ago the secretary of the American Federation of Labor addressed the Committee on Immigration of the House of Representatives. He said that upon the most desultory and imperfect advices that he had from over the country there were several hundred thousand men in the United States out of employment. Senators may smile and treat this as a matter of little moment now, but you may regard it more seriously a little later.

He said another thing: That in 90 days you would see the grim formation of the bread line in every industrial center in America. I believe that the man who perhaps knows most about unemployment in the United States is sitting within the sound of my voice. Whatever the secretary of the American Federation of Labor may know about the matter comes to him in telegrams from several cities, and from this information he made the calculation upon which he based his statement before the committee that there are 300,000 men out of employment. That tells the story as he knows it at that particular moment. I happen to be a member of the committee of conference on the census bill. We had before us yesterday an address, which stirred deeply with me the responsibilities that are upon that conference committee at this time. Dr. France, a Member of this body, I believe through many years has given great attention to the question of social conditions and the legislation necessary to meet them. He has given more attention to these problems, perhaps, more than all the other men in this body combined. I do not think anyone who listened to his address before the Senate but had the most unbounded respect for his learning and his mastery of all the matters involved in the propositions which he discussed. In speaking before the committee of conference yesterday Senator FRANCE stated that beyond any question there are in the United States to-day close to 1,000,000 men out of employment—not 300,000, but 1,000,000—and that when the large army from the other side was finally discharged there would be 2,000,000 men in the United States out of employment.

Things happen very rapidly in these days. We have a great Army of four and a half million men to be demobilized and must again be absorbed into the industrial life of the country, and then we must meet the changed conditions that suddenly transform industry from a war to a peace basis. That can not be done without a jolt, without a shock to the economic system of this country. Do you believe that you can pass over that situation and not produce conditions which may possibly be very disastrous to our social order? And is it not well for us, when we stand, as we do this afternoon, upon the threshold of an appropriation to distribute as an act of gratuity and of doubtful constitutional authority at the best, $100,000,000 for agricultural implements, fertilizer, and a wide range of things that come within the terms of this bill in foreign countries, to consider these matters? And for what are we at this time to make this appropriation? Why, the very messages we have received pretty plainly indicate. It is not proposed to use it primarily to save life, but to control principles, to meet arguments, to arrest the progress of socialistic propaganda.

Mr. President, I am making no defense of any particular form of government that is advocated in the Old World, but I say that the principles and the arguments back of socialism must be met with something beside food. We may drain the Treasury, we may pour the wealth of this Government into the currents of the life of the countries on the other side seeking by free-lunch counters to answer the arguments of those who have suffered the injustice of such governments as the Russian Government, and we will have squandered every cent sent to them. Nay, more, we will have discounted and rendered unworthy and prejudiced the good work that this Government ought to be able to do as an example to the other Governments of the world. It is argument and example that must be used to effectively meet argument.

I ask for a moment to place a brief, very imperfect, and fragmentary survey of the situation in this country before the Senate, and I send to the Secretary's desk several letters and some telegrams, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 21, 1919.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I herewith inclose copies of telegrams in regard to unemployment received from the secretaries of the central bodies of these cities, which are additional to the ones I submitted in my hearing last Thursday before the House Committee on Immigration.

I have also received information orally from a number of officers of international unions that some of the larger employers of labor are discharging their men and then reemploying them at a lower rate. In support of that statement I attach a communication received from President William H. Johnston, of the International Association of Machinists, with a statement prepared by Vice President Anderson, which will throw a sinister side light upon ill-advised action taken by a number of employers of labor that is creating great unrest among their workers and seriously hampering the efforts of the officers of the trade-union movement to adjust grievances without their members resorting to a strike.

Yours, very truly,

FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1919.

Mr. FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I was much interested in reading the statement made by you before the Senate Committee on Immigration, and I have requested Vice President Anderson to compile some figures relative to the number of employees laid off in the machine industry.

It may interest you to know that a number of firms are accentuating the existing unrest caused by unemployment by increasing their hours instead of decreasing them, which would be the natural thing to do under the circumstances

There are quite a number of firms that have been working on the basic eight-hour day that have served notice on their employees it is their intention to return to the 10-hour workday.

The Mitchell Motor Car Co. and the Prefix Radiator Co., both of Racine, Wis., attempted to compel the men to give over the basic day to a 10-hour day, and as a consequence the men went on strike.

The J. B. Wise Co., of Watertown, N. Y., where an 8-hour day existed, posted notice that the 8-hour day would be discontinued and the 10-hour day established. As a result the men in that plant went out on strike.

There are quite a number of employers who have been working under the award made by the National War Labor Board, which was supposed to be in effect for the duration of the war. They have now served notice on their employees that so far as they are concerned the war ended on November 11, 1918, when the armistice was signed, and therefore the award is no longer in effect, and that the employees would be discharged and reemployed at the old wage rate in effect before the award was made; or, in other words, they would be expected to work for prewar wages, despite the fact that the cost of living has not been lessened.

Among the firms which have taken the position referred to is the Worthington Pump Co., Cudahy, Wis. While the award was supposed to be in effect until May 1, or for the duration of the war, they have taken the position that the war is ended and they are no longer obligated to abide by the award.

The Willys-Overland Co., at Elyria, Ohio, have taken a similar position, paid all their employees off, numbering several thousand, and reemployed them at rate existing before the award was put into effect.

There are numerous other firms which could be mentioned. Possibly, we shall have quite a complete list in the next week or so. However, this information, in addition to that Mr. Anderson is getting up, showing the number of men laid off in the different cities in the country, will be very illuminating, and you may make any use of it you desire.

With best wishes, I remain,

Fraternally, yours,

(Signed) WM. H. JOHNSTON,
International President.

About 4,000 men have been laid off to date in Fitchburg, Mass.

Between 500 and 600 machinists out of work in Chicago, Ill.

About 1,000 machinists and toolmakers and 8,000 specialists laid off in Newark, N J. The names of some of the shops where the greatest layoffs occurred are as follows:

Gould & Eberhardt Co., Newark, laid off 250 machinists, 100 specialists. Employed 800 during war and manufactured Gould & Eberhardt shaper. Were working basic 8-hour day 10 hours a day, with time and one-half time for overtime. Now they are working the 10-hour day and paying straight time for it. They are trying to reduce rates by offering to break in new men at a low rate.

Splitdorf Magneto Co., Newark, laid of 100 machinists and 200 specialists. Manufacture the Splitdorf magneto. Before war employed 1,000. Working basic eight-hour day, paying time and one-half for overtime. Shop committee requested company to stop overtime, but they refused and trouble is brewing.

International Arms and Fuse, Newark, laid off 800 machinists and toolmakers and about 7,000 specialists.

Syming, Anderson Co., of Rochester, N. Y., has practically closed down their plant, causing about 4,000 men to be out of work. Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., Rochester, laying off from 25 to 30 men per day.

Colt Fire Arms Co., of Hartford, Conn., has laid off close to 4,000 employees out of 7,500. Pratt & Whitney Co., Hartford, have laid off 1,300 out of 5,000. The McIntyre Machine Co. and the Hartford Machine Screw Co. discharged a number of their employees and then attempted to rehire them at a lesser rate.

Bradley Car Co., Worcester, Mass., laid off 9,000 men. John Bath Co., Worcester, Mass., laid off 50 men and are now hiring help at reduced wages. Reed Prentice Co., Worcester, laid off about 150 men and are attempting to rehire them at lesser rate.

Vim Motor Co., Sandusky, Ohio, normal force in machine department, 200; 175 laid off, while 10 girls and 15 men were retained. Working 55 hours week; basic week 45 hours, time and one-half for overtime. Sandusky Foundry & Machine Co. laid off 50 out of 80. Working 59 hours week. Other shops in Sandusky using every effort to enforce 10-hour day, and are well lined up to resist any increase in wages.

Pierce-Arrow Motor Car Co., Buffalo, N. Y., laid off entire night force—approximately 1,000—and about 3,000 of day force. Curtiss Aeroplane Co., Buffalo, laid off about 15,000. American Car & Foundry, Buffalo, laid off about 2,000. Russell Motor Car Co., Buffalo, laid off about 1,000. King Sewing Machine Co. laid off 500; Bethlehem Steel Co. about 1,500; Donner Steel Co. about 1,000; and about 800 were laid off in smaller shops in Buffalo. Total, about 25,800 men out of work.

Reports from Columbus, Ohio, indicate that the contract shops in general are only retaining 10 per cent of their force. The general impression is that they are trying to lower wages.

In New Haven, Conn., the following lay offs have occurred:

Winchester Repeating Arms Co. laid off 9,000 out of 20,000.

Marlin Rockwell Corporation laid off entire force of 4,000 men.

Driggs Manufacturing Co. retained 10 men out of ordinary force of 160.

Trego Motor Co. retained 200 out of 500.

Lay offs affecting not so many men occurred in a number of other shops in New Haven.

Since the signing of the armistice a number of men have been laid off in St. Paul, Minn. About 2,500 machinists out of work.

PAN AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
January 20, 1919.

Mr. FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor,
American Federation of Labor Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have read with much interest your statements appearing in the Washington Post in reference to the state of unemployment and to the possibilities of "bread lines" by May 1. I have also read what purport to be refutations of your statements by some of the employers and business men in several industrial centers.

In part it may be true that in those places they refer to the state of unemployment may not be so acute, but this does not necessarily mean that the same conditions of unemployment apply in other industries. Take the copper industry, for example.

I have just received two letters, one from Luis E. Soto, secretary of Miners' Union No. 84, of Metcalf, Ariz., and the other from J. Ignacio Garcia, secretary of Miners' Union No. 80, of Morenci, Ariz., wherein it is stated that during the last two weeks the mining companies in that district have thrown 700 men out of employment. The Shannon Copper Co. completely suspended operations. And, furthermore, it is stated that in the course of a few days 300 more men will be laid off. If it be true, as the employers in that district state, that there is no market for copper at present, what will be the result when the copper companies in the other producing States follow the same action? In my opinion, we will not have to wait until May 1 for the inauguration of the famous "bread lines."

Incidentally, the miners in the Clifton-Morenci-Metcalf district have asked, "What will the American Federation of Labor and the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers do to meet the crisis that is facing the copper industry?"

C. W. DOYLE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, those telegrams were sent to me by the Secretary of the American Federation of Labor on Wednesday. The conditions are changing with every hour. You can not pick up any newspaper, morning or afternoon, that it does not record some new phase of this serious situation; and it seemed to me that it was proper for Senators to have before them these facts for consideration at the time they considered this appropriation, for I have not much doubt, Mr. President, that the next 60, possibly 30, anyway 90, days will present to us problems the meeting of which will tax our wisdom and possibly our resources. They must be met as they arise; but at the same time it seemed to me quite worth while that they should be taken into account and should be made part of the record of this proceeding.

But I do not know; perhaps I would not have been prompted to institute this inquiry by telephone from the American Federation of Labor, and bring to my desk through the mails the situation as they had it in hand day before yesterday, except for the fact that one of the Senators, in the course of the discussion of this bill, arraigned the labor of this country as responsible for any unemployment that exists.

Mr. President, it seemed to me so unjust, so unworthy of the Senate, that it ought not to stand upon the RECORD without some answer. I do not hold any brief for the laboring men of this country. I represent in part the State of Wisconsin. We are an agricultural and a manufacturing State; but in a way, Mr. President, I feel some responsibility, as does every Senator, for legislation that concerns the whole country.

It has been stated in the course of the debate upon this bill that laboring men are responsible for the unemployment there is in this country to-day; that ordinary labor is demanding $6, $8, and $10 a day for its services; that the advance in wages is responsible for the high cost of living; that before the war labor constituted 50 per cent of the cost of the articles produced, and that now it constitutes about 85 per cent.

Mr. President, such statements ought not be permitted to stand in support either directly or indirectly of any legislation so important as this legislation is; and it seems to me any Senator ought to be quick to rise upon this floor—I have waited for others to do so—to resent the statements made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do; of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has some supporter of the bill made the statements to which the Senator has just referred?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I so understand. I have not any doubt but that the Senator who made the statements here will support the bill. I understand he spoke in support of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not heard any Senator supporting the bill make those arguments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, of course, the Senator has not been here all the while to catalogue all the Senators who have supported the bill. I would not misquote anybody, Mr. President. Listen:

You will find 20 applications for persons to be employed where you will find 1 who asks for employment.

What do you think of that, in the face of these telegrams and letters that are here; and what percentage of the situation in this country do you suppose those letters and telegrams represent?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state whom he is quoting?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I am quoting the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who, I believe, is a supporter of this bill. I understand he is. And no supporter of the bill questioned the statement, so they must have accepted it. Listen, again:

As a matter of fact, while before the war, taking ordinary products, the labor and raw material were about fifty fifty, there are now, in most cases, more than 85 per cent representing labor, which shows that the raw material has not gone up anywhere to the extent that labor has.

Oh, just think of that statement. If it means anything, it means that 85 per cent of the cost of the ordinary article represents labor. That put on to the laboring men the responsibility for the high cost of living.

Mr. President, I am going to demonstrate on this floor—not now; it will take some little time of the Senate when I get ready to do it—but I propose to demonstrate upon this floor that, as a matter of fact, in twenty-odd years the wages of labor instead of advancing have decreased when you consider the purchasing value of the wages, down to the hour when the European war broke upon the world; and I can make it so clear and so demonstrable that it can not be disputed. And, Mr. President, let me say if there should break over this fair country of ours disturbances—which God forbid—that should shake things to their foundation, it will be because we have gone blindly forward in the pursuit of wealth and so-called prosperity regardless of the men who toil and sweat and bear the burdens.

Listen again:

When you come to paying $6, $7, $8, or $10 a day for the most ordinary labor—

Shall that go undenied upon the floor of the Senate? Not while I happen to be a Member of it, and I waited nearly for this debate to close for some man who could speak with more authority here than I can to protest that statement.

What are the plain, indisputable facts?

Now, Mr. President, it is not possible for me to produce here to-day the exact amount of the labor cost of the ordinary articles of produce that enter into the daily life of the American people, because that is a matter of exhaustive calculation, of scientific investigation, which has not been made since the disturbances in cost prices resulting from the war; but I am able to put before the Senate some evidence that is indisputable, some evidence that nobody will contradict, and which bears so conclusively upon present prices and the relation of the labor cost in those prices to the other costs that I think it will be a conclusive answer.

In the first place, let me speak of the charge that has been made here, and unanswered, that labor is demanding and receiving excessive wages; that ordinary labor stands at six, eight, and ten dollars a day; that labor is responsible for the high cost of living. I deny it, and I will prove that it is not so. The veriest tyro in the study of economics knows, Mr. President, that the wage level is not the first to rise; that wages advance after all other advances have been made; that wages can not be advanced until such advance is forced upon the employer. The proof of that is that labor has been compelled to organize even to keep step in a measure behind the advancing conditions that compel the increase in wages.

Mr. President, perhaps I can make no better, fairer, or more complete answer to the statement that wages are responsible for the increased cost of living; that wages are excessive, and that wages are six and eight and ten dollars a day for ordinary labor, than to read you a little table I prepared from a Government publication, dated September, 1918, entitled "Monthly Labor Review." I take it that nobody will deny these figures.

I find in that Monthly Labor Review extended tables giving the rate of union wages in all the North Atlantic States for May 15, 1918. Now, I had a later report than this. I had one for November, and this was issued in September; but, in the first place, I did not know that I could get a later edition, and I made up my tables from this number, because I thought it was perfectly fair to take May 15. It would not be influenced by anything that has happened with regard to the cessation of the war, and it would show the very worst conditions that union labor, so far as wages are concerned, sought to impose upon this country in the North Atlantic States. But when I got hold of the November number, as I did late yesterday, I found that the rate of wages given in the November number is exactly the same as in the September number. They have not changed. They are the same. While I think of it, I am going to ask to print these tables as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Wisconsin is granted, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Right in connection with what I am saying now, I have a table that is a fair criterion of what those wage figures show, that I propose to put right into the text now, in connection with what I am saying. Now, let us see about those "excessive wages" demanded by labor during the stress, when war was on, when everybody was expected to be patriotic, and almost everybody was patriotic except a lot of profiteers.

What did the unions demand in the way of wages? I have gone through these tables and taken the highest wages that I could find for any city in any North Atlantic State, and the lowest that I could find, and I have put them into this table in order to show the trend of things.

These are the wages that union labor demanded in this country. Union labor can always command better wages than individual labor can get, and so this may be taken as the high tide of the appeal of labor for enough to live on. Let us see if it is excessive; let us see if it is $6, $8, or $10 a day for ordinary labor, for the man with the pick and the shovel. Let us see whether labor is less patriotic than the employers.

According to the union-labor scale of the 15th of May for bricklayers the highest wages they demanded in the North Atlantic States were $5.95 a day for eight hours' labor, and the lowest were $5.15.

Building laborers, evacuating scaffold men, and so forth—the highest wages they demanded, according to the union scale, were $3.82, and the lowest $2.40, in the North Atlantic States. At that time their wages would not purchase more than 50 per cent of the necessaries of life those same wages would have purchased before the war.

For carpenters the highest wages demanded by union labor on the 15th of May, 1918, was $5.20, and $4.36 the lowest.

Engineers, portable and hoisting, $6.66 the highest wages, $4.58 the lowest.

Hod carriers $4.40 and $2.56. Split that in two and you have what the money would purchase according to the scale of the prices of the necessaries of life at any time before the war; that is, $1.28 a day at the fair prices of the necessaries of life before the war and $2.20 a day. Yet, a man will stand on this floor and talk about ordinary labor demanding $6, $8, and $10 a day.

Painters, $5 and $3.66.

Plasterers, $5.86 and $4.58.

Plasterers' laborers—those are the fellows who carry the mortar for the plasterers, I suppose—$4.12 and $2.56.

Plumbers and gas fitters, $5.50 and $4.12.

Sheet-metal workers, $5.50 and $2.75.

Structural iron workers, $6.78 and $4.58.

Structural iron workers (finishers' helpers), $4.40 and $3.30.

Blacksmiths, $6.52 and $4.16.

Boiler makers, $6.30 and $4.77.

Machinists, $8.10 and $2.50. Machinists were the very highest paid mechanical labor in the country last May, when the purchasing price of the dollar was less than 50 cents.

Moulders (iron), $5.80 and $3.66.

Pattern makers, $7 and $2.75.

Granite cutters, $5.72 and $3.66.

Stonecutters, $5.50 and $4.12.

Mr. President, that is what organized labor demanded. We have some labor bureaus organized under the Federal Government. During that same period of time last summer they were seeking employment for men out of work and they got employment, and they put down in this bulletin the wages they were able to obtain for the men for whom they secured employment.

So I have here another table, Mr. President, the employment table, the actual results of the bureau organized to secure employment for unemployed people in the United States. I am going to ask leave to print that table as a part of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have selected, in so far as the table shows it, the very same employments that I selected for the first table, so that there can be a comparison instituted between what union labor demanded and what the United States Bureau of Labor or its subordinate organizations were able to secure for the labor that it placed in employment over the country. I will not take the time to read it. It corresponds very generally with the same figures that are here, and I will ask to incorporate it without reading in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Rates of wages paid to workers placed in employment by public employment offices in the United States July, 1918.

Occupation.	Rate of wages per day.
	Highest.	Lowest.
Blacksmiths	$7.00	$2.50
Boiler makers	7.00	3.40
Bricklayers	8.00	4.00
Carpenters	8.00	4.00
Cooks, male	5.00	1.50
Drivers, teamsters, etc	4.50	1.75
Dock laborers	6.00	2.40
Farm hands	4.00	1.00
Hod carriers	6.50	1.75
Laborers	4.50	2.00
Machinists	6.00	3.00
Plasterers	7.00	3.20
Plumbers	7.00	3.60
Structural iron workers	6.50	4.00

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for an interruption.

Mr. CALDER. Does the Senator's investigation show what the percentage of increase in the cost of labor has been during the past two years? I did not catch all his statement. I heard him read the rates of pay for men in the building industry. I know something of the building industry, and I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me, that the rates of pay in the building industry in the North Atlantic States have increased in the last two years about 30 per cent.

We are not going to have very much building activity this spring, I am afraid, and it will not be altogether because of the increased cost of labor. I find from inquiries, which I made the other day myself, that while wages increased in building 30 to 35 per cent, the cost of material that goes into new buildings has increased from 100 to 300 per cent.

Cement three years ago was about a dollar a barrel and to-day it costs $3 a barrel. Brick cost two years ago $7 a thousand and they now cost $15 a thousand. Spruce timber cost about $35 a thousand and now costs $65 a thousand.

So if the activities in building this spring do not go on it will not be entirely because of the increased cost of labor, but I will say to the Senator it will be more particularly because of the increased cost of the materials, which I contend is unwarranted in many respects.

I have always felt that if the men who are manufacturing materials should in these days try to sell their materials for the lowest margin of profit it would tend to start the industry again, and we would have labor more generally employed and business more active.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator's observations merely confirm what I am trying to present to the Senate, that whatever there is of this high level of prices which the people are finding so burdensome it is not due to the advances in wages. It is not the cause that brought it about, but the cause is, as the Senator from New York says, an unreasonable advance in the price of materials. It is the grasping spirit of the employers, and under the economic conditions that prevail in this country and that within the last 20 years have overturned the old laws of trade and competition the employers are enabled to fix arbitrarily the price of their products to the consumer. Under those conditions they are impelled to exact greater and greater profits and to advance the price of material unreasonably and throw upon the men employed in their various organizations a burden under which it is impossible for them to live without an advance in wages. Of course, the men demand an increase of wages. That follows as a necessity.

Mr. President, there is another feature of this matter to which I want to call attention. I did not intend to consume anything like the time I have taken, and I will make haste. It is the suggestion that the labor that enters into a finished product constituted before the war 50 per cent of the cost of that product to the consumer. There never was a more preposterous statement uttered in the presence of any sober-minded, serious thinking legislative body. It is so utterly at variance with the facts that it ought not to need any answer. It was followed up by the statement that the labor cost was responsible for about 85 per cent of what people are paying now for ordinary articles.

Senators, do you know that there has been a real, scientific, thoroughgoing investigations as to the labor costs of different products? There has been, and there are some real, established truths on that subject which nobody can dispute. Of course, I suppose there are people in this world who would scorn them because they think it does not make any difference. It makes a lot of difference. It has relation to the amount of tariff we should have. It has relation to what are reasonable demands upon the part of labor for their share of the wealth they produce.

In rough way, let me state some cost findings I think will not be controverted. This labor cost has a good deal to do with the tariff. I will state to my Democratic friends they will take it up one of these days and attach some importance to it. The labor value on the average in cotton goods does not exceed 25 per cent. On cotton goods, independent of hosiery, it will run about 20 per cent. That is the labor value in the article. You have had a tariff on it not representing the difference in labor cost between this country and competing countries, but you have had a tariff on it oftentimes representing more than the total labor cost of the article.

Take woolens. The labor cost does not exceed 20 to 25 per cent of the cost of woolens when put upon the market.

Upon other products, and very important products, too, the labor cost is very much less.

Iron is the basis of our industrial life. Iron and steel enter into almost everything as a part of the cost of production. So it is worth while for us to know something about the relative cost of the material and of labor in the production of iron and steel. That is a subject that always tempts me, and I must forbear to yield to the temptation to turn aside and discuss it.

I want to give you just a suggestion of the labor cost of producing steel and iron.

The report of the Bureau of Corporations on the cost of production in the steel industry issued May 6, 1913, is the most scientific, complete, and thorough-going investigation into the production cost of pig iron, ingots, steel rails, and heavier structural products ever made by any independent and impartial authority in this or any other country.

The investigation covered a period of nearly two years.

It embraced from 70 to 90 per cent of the total products of the respective articles discussed.

It includes nearly all of the manufacturing concerns making steel products, large and small.

Nothing short of a careful study of this report can convey an adequate idea of its scope and thoroughness in every detail.

As an example of its character, I quote one paragraph:

The meaning of the item of labor as forming a part of the mere costs of the several products needs brief explanation. The labor costs, as shown, represent in every instance the wages paid for all forms of producing labor for that particular product at that particular department of the works, including labor in repairs and maintenance.

Now, take pig iron, Mr. President. In Bessemer pig iron that costs $12.10 to produce, the labor cost is 73 cents. That is the part that labor plays in the production.

A ton of pig iron that sold in 1912 for $12.10 had in it as a part of the cost of producing it 73 cents of labor. The balance was made up of $6.10, cost of iron ore; $3.28, cost of coke; 43 cents, cost of limestone; 10 cents, cost of steam; 13 cents, cost of materials for repairs and maintenance; 12 cents, cost of supplies and tools; 24 cents, cost of miscellaneous work, expense; 18 cents, cost of relining and renewals; 3 cents for contingent fund; and 76 cents for general expense and depreciation.

Mr. President, the cost of that product to the American people has increased four or five hundred per cent, but the increase in the wages of labor in that industry has not been more than 70 or 80 per cent. Labor has received a very small share of the increased cost of that product. So with all the other products of iron and steel.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate to go through these various tables. I have them here. I am going to ask to print them in connection with my remarks and save time for the Senate in the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin will be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that I have brought to the attention of the Senate substantially all that I care to present here in connection with the pending bill. I believe that it can not be supported as a so-called war measure, neither do I believe that it can be supported as a peace measure, and I think it falls very far short of being a measure of charity. I apprehend from the expressions I have heard on the floor of the Senate that a majority of the Senate could not find constitutional warrant for supporting it on that ground.

I have brought to the attention of the Senate just a suggestion of the conditions that are rapidly developing and hourly growing more grave and serious in our own country. The afternoon paper that some one just brought to my attention prints further dispatches as to the grave conditions that exist here at home.

Then I desired to put on record here answers to the charges that have been made against the responsibility of labor for the high cost of living and for the unemployment that exists in the country to-day. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that the cost of living under existing conditions will advance rather than recede. I noticed by the evening paper—I think it was last evening—that one of the officers of the Quartermaster Department appearing before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives stated that from all the investigations and study that had been made by that department they were convinced that the cost of living would very rapidly advance in this country in the near future.

Mr. President, I do not know just how this is to be met by the people of the country. I do not believe that it will be helped any by our appropriating $100,000,000 to buy in our market here at home great quantities of food and sending them abroad.

I believe that this appropriation will tend to advance the cost of living upon the people in our own country. I believe that with the readjustments that are now coming, with the evident desire on the part of employers to reduce wages, and the impossibility of wage earners accepting a reduction of wages so long as the high cost of living stands where it does to-day, will be productive of very serious disturbance here, and that we are to be confronted with problems that, added to those that we now have, will be, I fear, almost tragic. Therefore I felt that I owed a duty to myself and to my constituency, if not to the Senate, to lay before the Senate the facts with respect to these conditions, so that in voting upon this bill Senators may weigh its effect upon our home conditions as well as any possible good or ill effect it may have abroad.

I thank the Senate for its patience and attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. In the absence of objection, they will be concurred in. The Chair hears none, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are concurred in. The bill is in the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McLean	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Harding	McNary	Smoot
Borah	Hardwick	Martin, Ky.	Swanson
Brandegee	Henderson	Martin, Va.	Thomas
Calder	Hitchcock	Moses	Trammell

Fernald	Kenyon	Poindexter	Williams
Fletcher	Knox	Pollock	Wolcott
France	La Follette	Pomerene
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Ransdell
Gay	McKellar	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume we are about to take a vote on the pending bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; I think so.

Mr. BORAH. That being the situation, I shall detain the Senate but a moment, and Senators need not leave their seats.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I simply want to make a few closing remarks in this debate. I think this bill presents the most extraordinary situation which has ever been presented to the Senate; certainly in my service, and I believe, in all probability, in the service of anyone within the sound of my voice.

It is an open secret, Mr. President, that not 5 per cent of the Senate are in favor of this bill. When I say that I mean that they would never have initiated any such movement, and the bill does not receive their unqualified indorsement, notwithstanding that they may feel constrained, under certain conditions which exist, to vote for it. I have heard only two Senators speak upon the floor who did not apologize for the vote which they were going to cast. It is an extraordinary situation.

The war for democracy closed upon the 11th of November last, and the peace conference met some several weeks thereafter. Within a very few days after they had gathered at Paris the world was informed that only such information as the organization there saw fit to give out would be given to the world with reference to the proceedings of that august assembly. When that statement was made I presume we all waited, some with anxiety, to know what kind of communications would really be given out. Now, from day to day we have had those communications. They mean absolutley nothing; there is not the slightest information. The only information which is given out is the fact that they met—that is, as to facts—and adjourned, neither of which facts are any longer of any great concern in view of the procrastinating progress which they are making. But as to what is considered, as to what is discussed, as to the opinions which have been expressed, as to the conditions which have been revealed, and as to the situations which are there not a particle of information is given in order that the world may be informed what is going on.

That, Mr. President, is an open violation of the most solemn pledge made by the President of the United States; made undoubtedly in the firm belief that it would be carried out; made undoubtedly in the belief that it ought to be carried out; made undoubtedly in the belief that it was essential to the formation of a peace treaty which would receive the commendation of the judgment of the world.

So, Mr. President, we have entered upon the European program of entangling alliances, and before we have passed the first milestone this Republic has accepted the fundamental principle of absolutism in government; before a fortnight has passed after we have entered into European affairs the Republic puts off her principles and accedes to the doctrine of absolutism. How far are we going to travel upon this road?

Now, Mr. President, comes the proposition that the American people, through their representatives, shall not exercise their judgment, but shall yield to a decree which has gone forth from this same assembly, the proceedings of which are kept secret from us; and Senators here, out of mortal dread and mortal fear of doing something that they ought not to do, are yielding their judgment in casting their votes at this time, and we, here in the Senate Chamber, are yielding also to the principle of acting without information and upon the dictation of those who are holding their sessions in secret.

So, Mr. President, not much time has passed since the armistice, but we have traveled a long distance. I am not a prophet, but I venture to say we are near the turning point; I venture to say that that lane is a short lane.

Let me read a single paragraph from a New York morning newspaper:

FORTY THOUSAND SERVICE MEN SEEKING JOBS IN CITY—NEARLY THIRD OF THEM ARE STRANGERS DEMOBILIZED HERE, AUTHORITIES BELIEVE—PROBLEM CALLED SERIOUS.

Forty thousand men just out of the Army and Navy are looking for jobs in New York. Fifteen thousand of them are strangers who decided to stay here instead of going home to look for work. The number of unemployed in the city almost doubles every week.

"The situation is serious and it soon may become alarming," is the way Dr. George W. Kirchwey, State director of the United States Employment Service, put it yesterday.

Mr. President, the conference at Paris may hold their secret sessions; they may dole out little statements, which mean nothing and inform us of no facts, and we here may yield our judgment out of very awe for the secrecy of the situation and vote upon the American people a tax of $100,000,000; but I venture to say that the first ship that leaves New York, with hungry men standing about the wharf, will reveal the secret as to where it is going and why it is going. Do you suppose that the people of this country will go hungry in order to sustain and stabilize the prices which war has brought upon us or to protect a few powerful interests? Do you suppose that they will permit these vessels to leave while their children and their families are begging for that which they are unable to give them in a free land? Blindly and subserviently we are contributing our influence to the cause of unrest and strife.

Mr. President, if the Senate of the United States had all the information which it is entitled to have, it would not vote the passage of this bill. I know the influence behind this bill. It is a sinister and intolerable influence, and the people of this country will not submit long to legislation put through under such influences and for such purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments be ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRANDEGEE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. In his absence and not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. As he, if present, would vote as I am about to vote, I feel at liberty to vote, and therefore vote "yea."

Mr. CUMMINS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I understand that that Senator, if present, would vote as I shall vote, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARDWICK (when Mr. VARDAMAN's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is out of the city on business of the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "nay." He is paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. NELSON] has been compelled to leave the Chamber on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. My colleague [Mr. KENDRICK] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." I shall therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote for the bill.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] are absent on official business.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. POLLOCK. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate by illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 18, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the relief of such populations in Europe, and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, German-Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

VALIDATION OF WAR CONTRACTS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am going to ask unanimous consent to take up a bill for consideration, but I am not going to ask that it be considered to-day. I should like to have it proceeded with the next time the Senate convenes; and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13274.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a bill to validate contracts that have been informally made. After it has been made the unfinished business I shall ask that it shall be laid aside until the next convening of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move to take it up now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear what is being said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13274.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be laid aside until the next convening of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. THOMAS. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 214) authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for such reasonable time as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not extending beyond the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for all payments of insurance installments heretofore or hereafter made under the provisions of Article IV of the war-risk insurance act in advance of the verification of the deduction on the pay rolls or of the payment otherwise of all premiums.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the reason for the passage of this joint resolution is set forth in a very short letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I ask to have read.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest that the Senator have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. I will ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 16, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to submit herewith a proposed joint resolution and to outline, briefly, the seriousness of the situation which confronts the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and which makes it imperatively important that the bureau turn to the Congress for a solution.

The accounting officers of the Treasury can not, under the laws governing the performance of their duties, allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for the payment of insurance installments on awards made under the authority of Article IV of the war-risk insurance act, unless the director of the bureau certifies that the premiums on such insurance have been paid. Insurance premiums are paid largely, almost wholly, by deductions on the pay rolls while the men are in the service; and I am advised that it is impossible at the present time, with the accounts unadjusted between the War Department and the bureau, for the director to make the required certificate. The necessary consequence of his inability to do so is, first, that the accounting officers will be unable to allow credit in these cases, and, second, that the disbursing clerk of the bureau will be compelled to suspend payments on these awards. In other words, it means that payments on awards of contract insurance under the war-risk insurance act must be suspended. The disastrous consequences of such action on the part of the bureau can not be overestimated.

The joint resolution here proposed will authorize and direct the accounting officers to allow credit to the disbursing clerk in these cases and will enable the bureau to continue the payments. The necessity for the adoption of the resolution is urgent, and the Treasury Department recommends it with the utmost earnestness.

Sincerely, yours,
CARTER GLASS,
Secretary.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. GAY. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. Sunday for the purpose of eulogies.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Sunday, January 26, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 24 (legislative day of Monday, January 20), 1919.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 24, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. S. J. Blum, D. D., of Bethlehem, Pa., offered the following prayer:

Lord God, our heavenly Father, we lift up our hearts to Thee in grateful praise and adoration. Thy mercies are new unto us every day and great is Thy faithfulness. Thou art ever ready to help us and to bestow upon us the things Thou seest we need which are for our highest and best good. We pray for Thy blessing upon the Members of this body in the discharge of their patriotic duties to their country. We pray for Thy blessing, too, upon the President of the United States as he sits at the peace table in Paris with the representatives of other nations. Give him wisdom and knowledge to pursue such a course as shall tend to lasting peace among the civilized nations of the world. This we ask in the name of Jesus Christ, our blessed Savior and Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 41. An act to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Yellowstone, Mont., for hotel and other purposes.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12881. An act to increase the cost of the public building at Eldorado, Kans.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT EUREKA, UTAH.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3384) amending the public-building act approved March 4, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 3384. To amend the public-building act approved March 4, 1913.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. A bill to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to accept title at Eureka, Utah, waiving the mineral rights. We have passed a good many of these bills.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the bill reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3384) to amend the public-building act approved March 4, 1913.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision of the public-building act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat., p. 876), which authorizes the acquisition of a suitable site, etc., at Eureka, Utah, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to add the following proviso, namely: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, accept a title which reserves or excepts all ores or minerals on the lands with the right of mining the same."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CLARK of Florida, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RETURN OF SOLDIERS TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes and have a resolution read in my time by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is the nature of the resolution?

Mr. GARLAND. It is with reference to bringing the boys back home.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object, but I want to give notice that I shall object hereafter to the reading of letters and resolutions upon this subject unless gentlemen read them in their own time.

Mr. MANN. This is a resolution by the gentleman himself.

Mr. GARNER. I am not going to object to this, but I give notice that I shall object hereafter.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer his resolution?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do it at this time.

Mr. GARLAND. I simply want to have it read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 516.

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives of the United States that the officers and soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces who have served and who are now serving in the United States Army overseas, having performed successfully and heroically the military duties required by their presence on foreign soil, ought to be returned to their homes, and as the representatives of the American people we hereby demand their return to the United States by every transportation facility available and that can be made available for such purpose; and that it is the sense of this House that the drafted men and the men of the National Guard or State Militia ought to be discharged from the military service immediately upon their arrival in this country.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I only want to add with reference to this resolution that from personal observation, having met the men over there who desire to return home, we ought to have some action taken rather than a continuance of words that we see nearly every day in the newspapers. These men are over there under conditions that are awful.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania know that the War Department is now availing itself of every possible method of transportation that it can toward bringing these boys home just as rapidly as it is humanly possible to do it?

Mr. GARLAND. No; I do not know that. I know that the men are over there, and outside of the casualties and some preferences for those who have positions, and a large number of the Red Cross, and so forth, that the men have no idea when they are going to get back. They are told that they will be there a year or more, in some instances, and yet they can not understand why they are kept there, where there is nothing around them but mud and rain, crosses over graves, destitution and destruction everywhere, houses shot down, little barracks that they have put up, surroundings insanitary; and these men are staying there without knowing why they are kept there. They are begging and pleading that some action be taken to bring them home. There are plenty of French and English soldiers to police, if police are necessary, but these men want to come back and do not know why they can not come back. It has got to a point where the private is charging that in his belief the officers, who are receiving big pay, are keeping them there or recommending their being kept there. That idea is prevalent nearly all over those camps, and something ought to be done to stop that feeling from growing.

It is asserted here on this floor and elsewhere that the War Department is using all possible haste to bring the troops back, and that it is using all the shipping facilities it can secure. In answer, now, let us see. In the annual report of the Secretary of War, 1918, we find the following under "Transportation of troops and supplies, embarkation service":

In the 19 months elapsing from the declaration of war to the signing of the armistice the Army created an embarkation service which succeeded in shipping overseas 2,075,834 men and 5,153,000 tons of cargo. Even these figures do not adequately express the extraordinary nature of the achievement. As time was required for the drafting and training of men and for organizing the production of supplies, most of the stupendous movement occurred in the last half of our active participation in the war. In the last 10 months—that is, from January 1, 1918, to the signing of the armistice—the Army embarked 1,880,339 men and shipped 4,660,000 tons of cargo. Nothing to compare with the movement of this tremendous number of men and tons of supplies across the Atlantic Ocean is known in the military history of the world.

* * * * * * *

By the end of December 187,916 troops and 7,579 marines had been embarked.

At this point negotiations were entered into with the British Government by which three of its big fast liners and four smaller troop ships were definitely assigned to the service of our Army. In March the movement jumped to 83,782 troops and 1,081 marines. It was in this month that the great German spring drive took place in Picardy, with a success that threatened to result in a German victory. Every ship that could be secured was pressed into service, and the aid furnished by the British was greatly increased. It was then that the transport miracle took place. In April 117,205 troops and 1,432 marines were embarked; in May 244,344 troops and 1,606 marines; and in June the numbers were 277,973 and 777. Before the 1st of July 1,000,000 men had been embarked.

The July record exceeded all expectations, the number of troops embarking being 306,185, and before the end of October the second million men had sailed from our shores. During the three months, June, July, and August, 875,753 men were embarked, and if May be added the total for the four months is 1,121,703. When the armistice was signed the total embarkations amounted to 2,045,169 troops and 30,665 marines.

Altogether from our entrance into the war until the signing of the armistice the Army shipped from this side of the Atlantic 5,153,000 tons of cargo. Unlike the case with regard to the troop movement, this cargo was carried almost entirely in American bottoms, and less than 5 per cent was lifted by allied ships. Please note that in June 277,973 troops and 777 marines were transported out of the country, and this gave in the 19 months of war an average of a little more than 109,000 per month, and at the same time an average of 271,200 tons of cargo was carried over. It is to be presumed we have all the shipping facilities we had on the average during the war months at least. But I am informed by the War Department that since the armistice was signed up to the 17th of the present month only 163,400 troops had been returned, and as more than two months had elapsed, the average per month with all the combined shipping facilities was less than 80,500 troops returned per month. We are not bringing cargoes of supplies back for Army purposes, and therefore nearly all of the shipping used to carry cargoes abroad can be made available to return troops to America.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, like all other gentlemen, I have read in the press of the country at different times various statements as to when the soldiers would be brought home. I have read the charges that there were delays. I have read the intimations that officers desiring to retain their positions were recommending that the men be kept abroad beyond the time when it was necessary. But, Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that there has never come from any official source, or any reliable source, charged with authority to keep the men there or to bring them home, a statement that they would be kept there beyond the time when necessity demanded. Furthermore, let me say that I think, once for all, Mr. Speaker, we ought to have some end to the efforts to create dissatisfaction concerning this matter. I wish to say that if these criticisms and these suggestions are unfairly made they ought to be stopped. We ought not to render the people of this country dissatisfied unless there is a basis in fact upon which to make such criticism. Within the past hour I have heard the Secretary of War, in a statement before the Committee on Rules, a public statement, say that the matter of bringing the soldiers home from France was engaging more attention of the department than any other one problem, and that every effort was being bent, that every available method of transportation was being obtained, and that the men were being brought and would be brought home just as rapidly as the transportation facilities of the world would admit of it. [Applause.] That being the official attitude, so declared by the department itself that has authority to act, I respectfully submit that we ought not to have criticisms that will render the fathers and mothers of the soldiers of this country dissatisfied unnecessarily and improperly.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. I will state to the gentleman that I am repeating the criticism of the soldiers, not making it myself.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2552. An act to provide for a leave of absence for homestead entrymen in one or two periods and for longer times.

PENSIONS.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order to-day may be postponed until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that pension business, in order to-day, be postponed until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. In case this unanimous consent is granted, it would not give exclusive right to the business in order on the calendar to-day to be taken up to-morrow, would it?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, any other equally privileged matter could be taken up, if it was the will of the House.

The SPEAKER No; the Chair would not recognize anyone for equally privileged business. If it had a higher privilege, he would.

Mr. GARNER. The main thing I want to know is whether we can go on with appropriation bills to-morrow in case the House desires to do so?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, if it is the intention not to give the Committee on Pensions its day, I shall object to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. It will not take two hours to get through with the pension business to-morrow. Everybody knows how the bills run. There is only one, as I understand it, and we can probably get through with that in 30 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I suggest that we can get through with it in 30 minutes to-day.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but it suits the convenience of both the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] to go on with this other bill to-day, and to take up the pension bill in the morning.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If it is the intention to take the bill up to-morrow following the disposition of this bill, I shall not object.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is my intention.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it the intention of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; it is. I have just talked with the gentleman from Ohio, and he is satisfied.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes; to take it up to-morrow. I am willing to do that.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I shall have no objection to having the order fixed for to-morrow following the disposition of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I ask unanimous consent that the order be that the pension bill follow the conclusion of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think it should be stated that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY] has one bill on the calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understood the request, it is that the business in order to-day shall be in order to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was not the request.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that pension business in order to-day be in order to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Oklahoma whether he expects the Indian bill to require the balance of the day? Why could not the pension business be taken up to-day?

Mr. GARNER. It could be taken up late this evening.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how much business there is on the Pension Calendar, but I think not a great deal. Why could it not be disposed of to-day?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I hope that we may get through with the Indian bill before the day is finished, and I have no objection to having the pension business follow the conclusion of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. That is, if the hour is not too late.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen are wasting enough time talking about the consideration of the pension bill to pass it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14746, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday a point of order had been reserved to the paragraph which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $676, to reimburse Benson County, N. Dak., for money actually paid by said county to the State of North Dakota for care of three insane Indians, Mary Josephine Pejihutaskana, Alfred Littlewind, and Joseph Langer, in the North Dakota State Insane Asylum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire, as I do not recall any similar item having been carried in a prior Indian appropriation bill, whether it is the practice of the committee to recommend reimbursement of Government funds to individual counties for the care of insane Indians, as is provided in the paragraph under consideration?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not remember another instance such as this, but the facts as disclosed to the committee were that the counties had expended this money in the care of these insane Indians and that it was a charge against the Government which ought to be paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think in establishing a precedent of this kind further investigation should be given as to what the policy of the Government should be.

Mr. HAYDEN. The situation is that the Government has a hospital for insane Indians at Canton, S. Dak. As I recollect the facts in the case, for some reason the hospital could not properly care for these people, and for a time they were cared for by the counties. When the hospital at Canton could take care of them they were sent over to the regular Government institution. It was only a temporary matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, at his discretion, not to exceed the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the money on deposit to the credit of the Osage Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma, to be expended for the support, education, and systematic vocational instruction of Osage children: Provided, That the expenditure of said money shall include the renewal of the present contract with the St. Louis Mission Boarding School, except that there shall not be expended more than $300 for annual support and education of any one pupil.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. It appears this item authorizes provision for the establishment of a manual-training school for the benefit of Osage Indian children.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Under an act of Congress that was passed in 1906, which provided for the continuation of the Osage Boarding School for a period of 10 years, and that at the expiration of said 10 years the school should be abolished. Last year the Indian appropriation bill continued that school until the 30th of June, 1919, and a great many of us think this school should be abolished; but some of the committee thought differently, and, in view of what other members of the committee desire, this provision was placed in here and the amount was reduced from $50,000 to $20,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. How could these children receive their education if this school were abolished, as was the original intendment of the Congress?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. They would receive education at the public schools in Osage County, Okla. They would receive education at the various mission schools and at the normal schools and in the university of the State, or they could be sent out throughout the United States, the same as many other Indian children, to any other school.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would any of the children suffer for want of education if this school were eliminated, as has been considered very seriously during the last several years?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Well, it is my honest opinion that they would not; but other members of the committee and the Bureau of Indian Affairs are very anxious to continue this school, in order to keep, in my opinion, a bunch of some 20 employees in office at an expense of something like $30,000 a year to the Osage Tribe of Indians. Now, personally, I was opposed to the continuation of this school last year; but it was a compromise proposition which was put in last year, and it is again this year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to what contract there is with any private party for the support of children attending this school?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The department has a contract, of course expiring the 30th of June, 1919, with the St. Louis Mission School to educate, board, and support 75 pupils at $125 per annum, and there are 75 in that school at the present time under that contract. Now, I felt that that contract should be continued, because it was a great deal cheaper to spend $7,000, or a little over that amount—I believe it would be $8,750—to educate 75 children than to spend $50,000 to educate 46, which they are doing at the Osage Boarding School.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there other instances where private parties contract for the board of children attending Government schools?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I think so; but I do not know and I would not undertake to say.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I think there are a number of places in practically every State where they have Indian children.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There are several States, and really it is necessary to continue some of the mission schools of different churches, for the reason that there have not been sufficient educational facilities provided by the Government; and if the Government now would undertake to provide those facilities it would involve an expenditure of a lot of money for buildings and things of that character, which the committee thought we had better not do.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Oklahoma is a member of the Osage Tribe, I believe——

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No, sir; Cherokee. I wish I were.

Mr. STAFFORD. And he is quite familiar with conditions there, and he states upon his individual knowledge that these children could be well provided with education at other existing schools. If that is the fact, what is the reason for continuing this private contract? In a way private, because they are having an outside party virtually provide for their education and sustenance.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not undertake to put my information against that of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER], because he lives in that district and has an opportunity of getting in touch with this condition perhaps a hundred times where I do once, but I do not quite agree that the children can be taken care of without this school, although he may be right about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. What are the ages of these 75 children?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. The St. Louis Mission School or the boarding school? Remember there are two different schools carried in this appropriation—one the Osage Boarding School and the other is the St. Louis Mission School. The St. Louis Mission School is carried on by one of the churches, and they have 75 children of all ages who attend that school; I presume running from 6 to probably 16 years of age. At the other school they are practically the same ages.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does that apply to both schools, that the children could find adequate accommodation in other existing schools in the neighborhood?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I think that they could, but the St. Louis Mission Boarding School, in my opinion, should be continued, because it is an exceedingly good school, and it is carried on at the exceedingly cheap price of $125 a year for the support and education of the children.

Mr. STAFFORD. You provide that no more than $300 per capita may be expended for the support and education——

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is the limit on the other school. The other school is run by the Government, in which they spend, I think——

Mr. STAFFORD. This limitation applies only to the amount that may be expended by the Government on the St. Louis Mission Boarding School. It is no limitation on the Osage school.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit, there is a limitation on the $20,000 in the appropriation, so that you can say there is a limitation on the amount that may be expended. And if the gentleman will permit a minute further, I wish to say that there were enrolled about 2,200 of these Osages. They are the richest people on the face of the globe. Of the 2,200, approximately 800 are full-bloods. Now, the gentleman will remember that the rolls were made 15 years ago, and quite a number of them are dead. They have, as my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] has already explained, an Osage boarding school in Pawhuska. This St. Louis Mission School is out in the suburbs, or near there. They have been continuing this Osage boarding school in the city of Pawhuska for a number of years, and when they made the agreement a few years ago they extended it for a period of 10 years. That period expired a year and a half ago, and last Congress continued it by an appropriation of $30,000 to this coming June. This $30,000 will enable us to take care of these children, and they had particularly in mind the children of full-blood Osages. The half-blood or mixed-bloods go into the public schools or other schools. Their parents send them away to school, but this appropriation was designed to take care particularly of the full-blood children. I want to say, while I am on my feet, that the subcommittee was out there at Pawhuska a year ago last March, and we found a good deal of sentiment among the full-bloods for the continuation of this school. The mixed-blood people did not want it continued, saying that there was too much money expended. There is a good deal of criticism about it, I am free to confess. The committee has felt, inasmuch as it had an attendance last year of 46—mostly full-bloods, and this was their school, and they had the property there and the school facilities—that we should authorize the department to the extent of using the $20,000 to run this school and furnish educational advantages to the Osage children, having particularly in mind the full-blood children. Each of them get about $4,000 a year in royalties from oil leases, so they have plenty of money. But this is particularly to maintain these schools and take care of the full-blood children.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, if it is the wish of the Indians themselves that the school should be continued, and the committee believes they are given proper education, of course we should continue the school.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am absolutely frank with the gentleman. The full-bloods there, in my judgment and in the judgment of the committee, want this school continued, whereas the larger majority of the mixed-bloods do not want it continued. About one-third of them are full-bloods.

Mr. STAFFORD. What other accommodations are available in case this school should be discontinued?

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, of course, we have the St. Louis Mission School, and they could contract with any other school they wanted to contract with and put the children in those schools. But let me say to you that in my judgment and in the judgment, I think, of the committee, this is really an ideal site for the school. It is on a very high eminence in the city of Pawhuska.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be very glad to have the gentleman's views.

Mr. SNYDER. The fact is that there are two schools—one a Government boarding school and the other a mission school. This boarding school has a very fine building and property, and it takes about as many employees to operate the school as there are pupils in it. Adjacent to it is this mission school, where each one of these pupils can be educated at a cost of $125 and receive better facilities for education than they can in the other school. There are a few people who desire to have this school continued, but there are many people there who are able to take care of a school of their own and who desire to have it discontinued and send their children to the other school. Now, that is the milk in the coconut. But we thought, inasmuch as there was a desire, even on the part of a few people who could afford to pay, that we would reduce the appropriation and limit it to an expense not to exceed $300 per pupil and let the school go on for another year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the Osage Indian school a Government institution?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. However, all the expenses are paid out of the Osage tribal fund. The $50,000 mentioned that has been carried heretofore came out of the Osage tribal funds, and this $20,000 will come out the Osage tribal funds.

Mr. SNYDER. I think, if the gentleman will permit this item to stand as it is, that next year we will be able to demonstrate to the committee that that school can be done away with entirely to the satisfaction of everybody.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have every confidence in the opinion of the gentleman from New York and the respective gentleman from Oklahoma, and I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, at his discretion, not to exceed the sum of $65,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the funds on deposit to the credit of the Osage Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma, for the support of the Osage Agency and pay of tribal officers and employees of said agency.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I want to turn back to page 38 to make some inquiries in reference to the provision to make available the funds on deposit to the credit of the Kiowa and Comanche and Apache Tribes of Indians in Oklahoma. Is there some one from Oklahoma who can give me some information about these expenditures? I make the inquiry now because it has a bearing upon another tribe in another State, namely, the Chippewas from Minnesota. I want to get the analogy between them. It seems there are only a few tribes where money is appropriated in this bill which comes from the principal of the tribal funds of the Indians, and I believe these represent several of these cases.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman said he would like to have information from some one of the Oklahoma delegation. From whom does the gentleman from Minnesota want information? Did the gentleman ask me?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. If the gentleman has it, I would be glad to get it from him.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will indulge me, I will ask him to propound the question again.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I have stated my reason for asking the question. I will proceed with the question. I wanted to know if the gentleman could state what the nature of this $250,000 was?

Mr. FERRIS. My information is that the money is all given to the Indians. It is their own money, and since they sold the land pursuant to the treaty of 1901 they have been withdrawing for a number of years $250,000 and distributing it among the 4,100 Indians. They give part of it to them in the spring and part of it in the fall. It is their own money. Of course the agency is all paid for out of their own money. It costs the Government nothing to run this agency.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I understand. This comes from the tribal funds of the tribe. I am not asking the question to criticize at all the way in which the money is being paid out. I understand also that the distribution is from the funds in trust for the Indians in the Government Treasury at this time?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I am asking the question because I want to get the analogy between that and the case of the Chippewas in Minnesota. Can the gentleman tell me what the fund to the credit of these three tribes is at the present time?

Mr. FERRIS. It is about $3,000,000.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Is it a credit to these three different tribes indiscriminately? Are they paid indiscriminately out of the fund?

Mr. FERRIS. It is in two funds, but not according to the tribes. It is in two funds by reason of the rate of interest. There is a 4 per cent fund and a 5 per cent fund. There has never been any allotment per capita of that money and it is a lump sum belonging to the three affiliated tribes.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. What disposition is made of the interest on the funds?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know what the law authorizes as to that. The "justification" says that it is paid out.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. And it is paid out in addition to the $250,000 here?

Mr. FERRIS. I am not sure about that. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who sits near me, says the "justification" says that. I am not positive about that, but I feel I am positive with regard to the $250,000.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Can the gentleman turn to page 238 of the hearings there?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; I have it.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Under the analysis of expenditures, the salaries and wages, and so forth, are set down as having been $18,532.61.

Mr. FERRIS. That is the "justification" for the $25,000 item for running the agency. That is not a part of the $250,000 item. If the gentleman will examine the bill he will find that one paragraph withdraws $25,000 for the support and maintenance of the agency and of that sum $18,532.61 goes for salaries and wages, and so forth.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Can the gentleman tell about the item on page 239?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes. It is about the middle of the page, down about the middle of the page. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is the amount of the appropriation and the amount expended is $247,932, a small balance remaining.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Can the gentleman tell us about that amount of $247,000, the amount that was expended for salaries and wages of employees?

Mr. FERRIS. I think none of that was spent for salaries and wages of employees. I have gone over that a number of times with the agent in charge there, and they make up a new roll every year, and the new-born and adopted members of the tribe are included, and they divide that $250,000 equally among all the members.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. That is a per capita payment?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; that is a per capita payment.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. But it is a per capita payment from the principal fund on deposit in the Treasury?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. And it is a per capita payment in addition to the payment per capita of the interest?

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is true, but I am not sure.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Will the gentleman look that up and let me know later?

Mr. FERRIS. I will be glad to. Now, while the gentleman is on his feet I want to say, occupying just a moment——

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to give a little information in regard to this matter here—the point the gentleman from Minnesota is making with reference to the report. If you will turn to page 240 of the hearings, you will find that Mr. Meritt promised that an analysis of this report would be sent to us, and said that it was being prepared, and would be presented to Congress as soon as it was printed; but it has not been presented to us up to this time.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. The point I had in mind was to separate the amounts paid as a per capita distribution of the principal fund and the per capita distribution of the interest, and my question was whether or not these amounts were paid out for the expenses of the agency or to the individual tribal members. And as I understand the per capita distribution, it is paid to the individual tribal members and distributed among the tribal members.

Mr. SNYDER. The bureau promised to send us that analysis in time for consideration in connection with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH] is delving into the matter. I do not care to pursue further the question he asked about, but I was startled, I may say, to find last night that on page 59 and on page 60 a lump-sum appropriation of $2,325,000 was allowed. That ought not to be. We agreed three or four years ago here to allow the money to be taken out of the tribal funds to pay the expenses of this agency, because the Committee on Indian Affairs told me and the House that it was the policy where the Indians had money to make them pay their own expenses. I think that is not an unreasonable thing, but even if the item were not subject to a point of order I would not be willing to let that large sum be paid by the Indians without some explanation—without at least some explanation. This does not impress me as a proper way to proceed.

Now, I have scarcely looked at the Indian appropriation bill for the last year or two, but last night I rummaged through this bill a little, and I found on pages 59 and 60 this language—

SEC. 26. That in addition to the Indian tribal and treaty funds, the expenditure of which is specifically authorized elsewhere in this act, and such sums as may be required for equalization of allotments, education of Indian children, per capita and other payments to Indians, and expenditures for the Five Civilized Tribes, in accordance with existing laws, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend—

What?

not exceeding $2,325,000—

A lump sum—

from funds held by the United States in trust for the respective tribes, for support and civilization of the Indians under the jurisdiction of the following agencies, to wit:

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think we can stop all this controversy if the gentleman will allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think the gentleman can. This is to be expended from funds held by the United States in trust for the respective tribes. I call the attention of the gentleman of the Indian Affairs Committee to this, because I am going to make a point of order on some of these items. This will at least let us know what is going on.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; it is.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Two years ago——

Mr. FERRIS. This is to be expended from funds held by the United States in trust for the respective tribes, for support and civilization of the Indians under the jurisdiction of the following agencies—now listen to this—here they start out with Arizona, and propose to take an item of $10,500 from one tribe of Indians. And there are three or four pages of lump-sum moneys that they are taking out of the Indian funds and expending; and down here under the Kiowa Agency, which I happen to know something about, they are taking out $31,900. There are 22 States in this amendment. There are 69 tribes involved. No one knows where this money is to be expended. We are entitled to know. It is not too much to ask.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. These appropriations which the gentleman is discussing have heretofore been spent under permanent appropriations——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we are all interested in the explanation of this item, and the gentleman can not be heard on this side.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I thought I was expressing myself so that I could have been heard if we had had order in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. This item of $2,325,000 simply carries into effect and places specifically in this bill amounts that have been spent in the past under permanent appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allotted to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have just stated that in the past this item has been carried in permanent appropriations, treaties, and acts of Congress passed at different times without any opportunity for Congress to have supervision over it annually. This merely brings into the Indian appropriation bill amounts expended by the department in the past under permanent appropriations and of which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and myself and other Members had no knowledge. Now, the gentleman says he is going to make a point of order. I doubt if the item is subject to a point of order, because the year before last we passed what was known as the Dill amendment, authorizing these expenditures.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNYDER. We are discussing a section of the bill which has not yet been reached. I suggest that we ought to confine ourselves to the pending paragraph of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] was illustrating his argument by discussing the section which the gentleman refers to, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is referring to him.

Mr. SNYDER. This is a very important part of this measure, and it ought to be discussed in an orderly way.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want all this taken out of my time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] is entirely correct when he says we are discussing a paragraph that is ahead of us; but still we are discussing a paragraph that must come up for consideration, inasmuch as we are making appropriations for the same thing in two places in this bill.

Mr. SNYDER. We have put over two or three items in the bill for the benefit of Members who could not be here at the proper time, and I suggest that, if the gentleman desires, unanimous consent would no doubt be granted to have the matter put over.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not ask that. I think the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from New York are both right in saying that we are debating this a little out of order; but the gentleman from Minnesota raised the question and the matter was fresh in my mind, and if the gentleman will look he will see that page 60 of the bill deals with these same items that are dealt with in another place. They ought to be marshaled forward and all be dealt with together. We ought not to carry $2,325,000 as a practical deficiency in the back of the bill, so that no one can tell the relation of one to the other.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct, and we have made a provision so that in the next bill these items will all be grouped under one head, so that the House can know at one time what the total expenditures in any particular governmental activity will be.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the Committee on Indian Affairs have been doing some good work in requiring the Indian Department to tell where they get these tribal funds and how they get them, but that does not meet my objection. My point is, Should they take these funds at all? And I want to debate that.

Mr. SNYDER. How shall we find out whether they are entitled to it or not?

Mr. FERRIS. I think I know the way, and I am going to raise a point of order against these just as soon as we get to them and let the department present their authority for making an expenditure of $2,325,000. I want to say this so that the chairman of the committee and the other members of the committee can call them up and load up on the law, if they have a law, for spending a lump sum of $2,325,000. If they have, all well and good. If they have not, they ought not to expend the Indians' money. And if they have the authority under the law it ought to be repealed. They ought not to expend $2,325,000 of the Indians' money in a lump sum without specific authority and without having it carried in the proper place in the bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit me, the law has been repealed by the Dill amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman stated a moment ago that he did not think this was subject to a point of order because these had been carried in the appropriation bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; I did not say that. The gentleman did not listen to me. I said it was not subject to a point of order because the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL] two years ago proposed an amendment authorizing it to be appropriated in this manner.

Mr. FERRIS. But that was only for the fiscal year.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, no; authorizing it forever.

Mr. FERRIS. Where is that law?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It was in the law two years ago.

Mr. FERRIS. I have the law, and I find this language: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend for the benefit of individuals from the tribal fund not to exceed $2,500,000.

That was only for the fiscal year. Now, they come in and provide for it again.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is what we have been trying to do all the time and what we want to arrive at.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is expressing the opinion of every member of the committee, but the gentleman will recall that a year ago the item carried $2,500,000, and we have insisted on specifications, and now it is $2,325,000, and the bureau has admitted that by our requiring them to specify the items we are saving that much.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I do not wonder that I have not made myself plain to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]. There was a time when he kept up very closely with the appropriation bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs, but since he went off the committee his time has been so engrossed with public-land matters that I am sure he has not had his attention called to the good work that the Committee on Indian Affairs has been doing or else he would commend, not criticize, the action of the Indian Committee.

Now, what caused this legislation to be brought about? Prior to the adoption of the Dill amendment the department had been using from standing appropriations annually some three and one-half million dollars of tribal funds without accounting to Congress for it, without a single Member of Congress knowing anything as to how the expenditures were made. The gentleman from Washington, Mr. DILL, a new Member, very active and anxious to do something for the Indians in his State, wanted to stop these appropriations, so he proposed an amendment which said that no payment should be made from the tribal funds unless specifically appropriated by Congress. That is in pursuance of a policy which the gentleman from Oklahoma and I pursued when we were on the committee together. Last year when the department came in with their estimates they told us they were unable to give specific amounts, but they would give them for the succeeding year. So we asked them to prepare and present to the committee a statement of the expenditures of the year before, which were two million and a half dollars, and we appropriated two million and a half dollars in accordance with that statement.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Let me complete what I am saying and then I will be glad to yield. What do we do with the $2,325,000, $175,000 less than they had been using in the past? How is it to be spent? In accordance with existing law. If the law does not authorize it, it can not be spent. That is in the language of the bill itself.

Mr. FERRIS. It is a specific authorization. That is what I am objecting to. It is a hard and fast authorization.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Section 36 says "in accordance with existing law." Perhaps the gentleman has analyzed that more closely than I have. The department presented these sums to us as amounts that they were authorized to spend under existing law and we included them in accordance with their statement. If they have sent us statements including therein amounts that were not authorized by existing law, then, Mr. Chairman, certainly somebody has committed at least an error in office that demands attention not only in this committee but in both branches of Congress.

The gentleman from Oklahoma complained that we appropriate a lump sum of $2,325,000. That is exactly what we do not do. We say "for support and civilization of the Indians under the jurisdiction of the following agencies, to wit, Arizona, Colorado River, Fort Apache," and so forth.

Mr. FERRIS. All of this is, of course, commendable on the part of the committee, but it does not reach the substance because no one will be able to show positive law for any expenditure of it. I doubt if anybody can show a warrant to expend a large sum of money of that kind. While the committee is hammering away and improving it somewhat, it is not hammering the right thing, and that is the expenditure.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I thought the gentleman was criticizing our appropriating a lump sum. We do not appropriate a lump sum, but in detail, if the gentleman will read the following language: "for support and civilization of the Indians under the jurisdiction of the following agencies."

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman explain in detail where the money is to come from?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And where it must be spent. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. To tell in detail where it comes from and in detail where it must be spent. That is all you can say in detail in an appropriation act. I repeat that the committee has not at this time all of the authorizations which the department claims to have for each of these amounts, but if the gentleman makes the point of order the chairman, of course, will ask that the item be passed until we can get from the bureau the authorization for each one of these items, in accordance with their statement to the committee, which was that the items were authorized. The only thing we have undertaken to do here is to take a lump sum, two million and a half dollars, as I said before spent without any knowledge of Congress, without any report to Congress, and cut it up and assign it to different reservations where it is to be used and for the different purposes.

Mr. FERRIS. That is the very thing the gentleman does not do.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman can suggest to me why it does not do it, I will be very glad to have the language changed so that it will do it.

Mr. FERRIS. I may be wrong and the gentleman may be right, but if I can read the English language, this is an authorization directing them not to spend the money, but where to get the money.

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRIS. Surely I can not be mistaken about this—

That in addition to the Indian tribal and treaty funds, the expenditure of which is specifically authorized elsewhere in this act—

That is in addition to everything else—

and such sums as may be required for equalization of allotments, education of Indian children, per capita and other payments to Indians, and expenditures for the Five Civilized Tribes, in accordance with existing laws, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not exceeding $2,325,000 from the funds held by the United States in trust for the respective tribes.

I submit that the committee does not do what they say they do. They permit and tell him where to get the money, but the appropriation item does not have any restriction on what he shall do with it. I am more concerned about what they do with it than where they get it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. But the item goes on and continues—

For support and civilization of the Indians under the jurisdiction of the following agencies, to wit:
In Arizona: Colorado River, $10,500; Fort Apache, $87,291; Kaibab, $1,780; San Carlos, $145,990; Salt River, $365; Truxton Canyon, $55,000; Western Navajo, $100.

Mr. FERRIS. That is where they get the money.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It says—

And he is hereby authorized to expend not exceeding $2,325,000 from the fund held by the United States in trust for the respective tribes for support and civilization of Indians under the jurisdiction of the following agencies, to wit—

He is authorized to expend it where? In Arizona, and so forth.

Mr. FERRIS. It does not say that. It authorizes the withdrawal of it from certain reservations, but the Lord knows where he is going to spend it. It would be more dangerous if the gentleman was right than it is now, because they may proceed with the Five Civilized Tribes in the gentleman's State and spend it all on these 40 or 50 places.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They can not do that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Osage Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma, through its tribal council, is hereby authorized to employ, annually, a tribal attorney for said tribe, at a salary of not exceeding $7,500 per annum, a stenographer, and expenses, said contract of employment to be in full force and effect, as per the terms thereof, when executed by the Osage tribal council and said attorney, said salary and expenses to be paid quarterly and after said account has been audited and allowed by the Osage tribal council. This authority shall extend to said tribe for 10 years, unless otherwise provided by Congress. There is hereby appropriated annually from Osage tribal royalties received from oil, gas, or other mineral rights or other tribal funds $10,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, to pay for said services and expenses: Provided, That said contract shall be subject to cancellation by either party thereto upon 60 days' written notice.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say to the gentleman that the attorneys for these tribes of Indians are selected with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They are not selected at all for this particular tribe, because the tribe and the Secretary can not agree.

Mr. FOSTER. But as to the others——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is the rule.

Mr. FOSTER. And in this case the committee has sought to make a distinction of selecting an attorney at an expense of $10,000, and then permitting that to be done without any restriction, so far as the Secretary of the Interior is concerned. That is true, is it not?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes. That was done because the tribal council and the Secretary can not agree on this proposition. These people are the wealthiest people on the face of the earth. They have more things which would provoke litigation than any other class of people in the world. They ought to have some attorney, and because the bureau and the tribal council can not agree upon it they ought not to be punished and left without an attorney.

Mr. FOSTER. They have no attorney now?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Absolutely none.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me say to the gentleman that the Committee on Indian Affairs visited this Osage Tribe about a year ago. They are in my State, and in the district of my colleague, Mr. CHANDLER. The Osages are the richest people in the world. They have about 2,200 and odd enrolled members. They have 1,500,000 acres of land, and about one-tenth of it has been leased for oil purposes. Great lakes of oil have been developed underneath their land. As a result of the oil produced, there is now being paid to them annually per capita between four and five thousand dollars a year, so that this tribe is really the richest tribe of Indians in the world. They have certain differences with the department. They can not be represented up here before the committees of Congress. They can not send an attorney here; they can not send their tribal council here. There is no way for them to present their claims to Congress now without the permission of the Secretary of the Interior. The gentleman has not had the experience upon these Indian matters that some of the rest of us have had. Personally I have lived under the department every day of my life. We have been under the supervision of the Interior Department down there in Oklahoma always, and if you are going to allow the Secretary of the Interior to pick the attorney, to let him be hand-picked by him, you might as well have none at all, because the attorney then must go down and first get orders from the department and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, else he will not be employed the next year. His employment depends upon his representing their views and not the views of the Osage Indians. I am not in favor of the employment of anybody except a high-class man. I am not in favor of the employment of an attorney that represents the Osages just for the purpose of antagonizing the department or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but I believe they have so much wealth and they have such large interests at stake that they ought to be represented to the extent of $10,000, to the extent of the expenditure of that amount of money, and this limits it to that amount, by an attorney of their own choosing.

Now, let me say to my colleague and call his attention to the fact that by reason of their not being properly represented the individual Osages have suffered some $200,000 loss in the last year or two, and let me explain this to him: They have four allotments—the first, second, third, and fourth. One of these allotments of 160 acres is a homestead, the other allotments are what are known as surplus land. The homestead land is nontaxable, the surplus land is taxable. The department, through its representative, advised these Osage Indians—did so erroneously—that their surplus lands were nontaxable and, as a matter of fact, encouraged them not to pay taxes out of the money which had been paid to them. Now, as those taxes became due they had to pay a penalty of 18 per cent, and, as I understand and believe, which is upon reliable information, I recall that by reason of this mistake they had to pay out about $200,000 more than they would have had to pay if they had had the right legal advice. Now, I have always contended that these people with these large interests ought to be represented by a high-class attorney, and I believe they ought to have something to say about the naming of him. Let me say to the gentleman, for years I was attorney for the Cherokee Tribe of Indians, and represented them before committees and before the departments and before the courts here, and I do not believe that any tribal representative ought to be dictated to by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior, because——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will say that all of these tribal attorneys that are now employed where approval has to be made by the Secretary of the Interior they can not, of course, represent any other views than those entertained by the department. The gentleman from Illinois appreciates that, and at the present time these Osages have not any attorney to represent them, nobody to come here before the committees of Congress. And let me say another thing to him, that by the act of 1906 there was a provision made for the leasing of all of their country for oil and gas. The time expires in 1931. The representatives of the Osages and the Oklahoma delegation have been trying to get the department to comply with the law and to lease this land. Now, about one-tenth of it, I understand, has been leased, the rest of it has not been leased. If this time runs longer, and it is not leased before five or six years, and it can not be fully developed before that time, you can understand the Osages stand to lose millions of dollars. Now, they only allot the surface of their land, retaining for the tribe the mineral rights. In other words, the surface of the land has been allotted and the oil and gas rights have been reserved to the tribe up until a certain length of time. Now, they have other controversies existing between the tribe and the department here, things that they want legislation upon, and so forth, and I sincerely trust that the gentleman from Illinois will not make the point of order against this provision. It is one, I know, which is unanimously approved by the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I know the members of the special committee that visited this Osage country in March, 1917, were firmly of the opinion that they ought to have a representative, and I do not know of a single Osage out there who does not feel that he ought to be represented by a high-class reputable man before the department and before the Congress and before the courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would just like to say for the information of the gentleman and others of the committee that in the hearings, on page 253, you will see that the committee endeavored to find out why the department would not recommend an attorney, and I asked Mr. Meritt, after considerable other questioning, this:

Mr. SNYDER. Will you tell us the real reason why the department does not want the council to select its own attorney to look after the interests of the Osage Indians?

Mr. MERITT. The department and the Indian Office have taken the position that there are no complicated legal matters at the Osage Agency that require the services of a tribal attorney. It is very largely an administrative proposition, and we have a superintendent and a large number of agency employees to look after the interests of the Osage Indians. There are also a number of lawyers in that office who take care of the legal work.

Mr. SNYDER. But there is no one who has been selected by the Indian council to look after what they consider to be their interests, in their own way?

Mr. MERITT. No one has been selected by the Indian council and approved by the Secretary of the Interior for that work.

I just want to say that this matter has been before the committee for several years, and there is no question in my mind but what this tribe of Indians, who have plenty of money to pay for an attorney, should be allowed to have one of their own to look after their own interests, and I hope this section will stay in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this case ought not to be different from others and that, so far as I can see, I see no good reason why the agency down there and the superintendent should not agree with the department in the selection of an attorney, and I therefore make the point of order.

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. FOSTER. I will withhold the point of order, but I desire to state to the gentleman that I am going to make it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have no interest in the Indian country nor have I an Indian in my district——

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. I will reserve the point of order further.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to say that I was one of the committee which investigated the condition of the Osage Indians in March, 1917, and we talked with a great many of the full bloods and a great many of lesser degree of Indian blood, and they unanimously desired to have an attorney regularly employed by them and compensated out of their abundant funds.

They are unwilling to risk important business matters to a lawyer who is not employed by them and who is not their choice. We found a great many very intelligent Indians there among the full bloods, many educated ones, some of them from Carlisle and other good schools near by, and there is no tribe of Indians in the world that is so wealthy per capita as the Osage Indians. Some of these families get as much as $20,000 a year from oil leases, rental payments, and from other sources. And it does seem to me that if there is any class of people in the world who ought to have an attorney, and one of their own choice and one able to take care of their interests, it is these Osage Indians. There is no one who speaks for them here in this matter that has any interest in this item. The Indian Bureau for some cause is not in harmony on this subject with the Osage council. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order. The item is clearly subject to a point of order, and will go out if the gentleman insists.

Mr. FOSTER. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order? [After a pause.] If not, the point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

SEC. 18. For expenses of administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, Oklahoma, and the compensation of employees, $185,000: Provided, That a report shall be made to Congress by the superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes through the Secretary of the Interior, showing in detail the expenditure of all moneys appropriated by this provision: Provided further, That hereafter no part of said appropriation shall be used in forwarding the undisputed claims to be paid from individual moneys of restricted allottees, or their heirs, or in forwarding uncontested agricultural and mineral leases, excluding oil and gas leases, made by individual restricted Indian allottees, or their heirs, to the Secretary of the Interior for approval, but all such undisputed claims or uncontested leases, except oil and gas leases, now required to be approved under existing law by the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid, approved, rejected, or disapproved by the superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma: Provided, however, That any party aggrieved by any decision or order of the superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma may appeal from the same to the Secretary of the Interior within 30 days from the date of said decision or order.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the paragraph just read?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

I want to call the committee's attention to this appropriation and to the vast amount of work that is being done at this agency. The superintendent in his last report, made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, sets forth the amount of the oil royalties received from various sources for the restricted Indians. These amount to over $27,000,000. These sums are handled by this agency, and handled in a very satisfactory and commendable way. I notice also in the report as to the income tax that he had made a report for one Indian and paid to the United States Government $114,182, which is undoubtedly derived from oil. In fact, oil is the great industry of the Five Civilized Tribes. And this agency handles those funds, as well as various other funds, claims against the Indians, and distributes this $27,000,000 every year in an entirely satisfactory and commendable way.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. HASTINGS: After the word "leases," in line 3, page 43, strike out the following words, in lines 3 and 4: "excluding oil and gas leases"; and after the word "leases," line 6, page 43, strike out the following words: "except oil and gas leases."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, in support of this amendment you will see that this only would permit the approval of the uncontested leases by the Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes at Muskogee. It does not take any supervision away from him. It still requires the approval of all of those leases, but it permits the approval of the uncontested leases only by the Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes, and it provides that any party being aggrieved by any decision may appeal to the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, let me say, Mr. Chairman, that the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. He has 250 employees under him, divided into bureaus. There are as many employees in the Indian Service in Oklahoma as there are in the Indian Department here at Washington. All are honest and capable. And this amendment does not seek to take away any supervision of any Indian at all, but retains it. It permits the uncontested leases to be approved by the local man there in Oklahoma.

And I want to explain to the House that it does not transfer that supervision to any locally elected officer in Oklahoma, but it gives that supervision to the local representative of the Federal Government, who, as I have already stated, is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. So there is no supervision taken away. The supervision is retained and only applies to uncontested leases.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do.

Mr. MANN. Is the $185,000 appropriated here the total expense of this agency?

Mr. HASTINGS. No, sir. There is a good deal more money, the exact amount of which I do not know, expended there. For instance, they have been expending about $30,000, in another item, out of certain of the tribal funds, and there are other items taken from lump sums and expended there at that agency, the total amount of which I do not know. But the number of employees is given here in the hearings as being about 250. The commissioner stated before the committee that they were paid out of their funds, in addition to the $185,000.

Mr. MANN. I supposed if they had 250 employees down there that they were not wholly compensated out of this $185,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] will permit me——

Mr. MANN. And I further supposed, if the gentleman will wait a moment, that when the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] thought this agency passed through it $27,000,000 it did not do it at the rate of about two-thirds of 1 per cent.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will permit me for a moment, I think I can explain it.

Mr. MANN. I am going to yield to my friend from Oklahoma, but I want to say that if he would fix up this bill so that it would show what the expense of this agency was, if it requires an appropriation, it would throw a little light upon the subject. I suppose this $185,000 is to be paid out of the Treasury?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And then they take money out of the Indian funds and spend what they need?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They did that up to 1912, and then we had a provision inserted in the law which restricted the use of tribal funds to schools by per capita and equalization allotments unless specifically provided otherwise by Congress.

Mr. MANN. I know; but what difference does that make with the Indian Office?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman does not hold me responsible for that?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That does not include all that is spent for the Indians. This does not include relief for the sick, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. This is only for the compensation of employees, and it does not include all the compensation for employees?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No. It does not include those employed in the schools or those employed to look after the sick and hospitals and all.

Mr. MANN. It does not include all employed at the agency?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will refer to page 265 of the hearings——

Mr. MANN. I am not going to refer to the hearings. That takes up too much time. The members of the committee ought to be able to tell us the information that is contained in the hearings without reading them.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am trying to show that some of these employees are paid from some other fund.

Mr. MANN. I have no reason to complain of this agency. I think if they do all this business down there, with all the work that is going on and the immense sums of money that the Indians are receiving, they would probably require more money than is appropriated here. So far as I know, they are doing good work; but then I do not know much about it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, with respect to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, why were oil and gas leases excluded from that class of leases that might be approved or rejected or paid by the superintendent at this agency, in the first place?

Mr. HASTINGS. That was a Senate amendment, and it was put on the Indian appropriation bill last year.

Mr. WALSH. It was the law before last year?

Mr. HASTINGS. No. It required the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it required approval by the Secretary of the Interior. Those claims with reference to oil and gas leases had to be sent here to Washington?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; and other claims as well.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. All had to be prior to last year.

Mr. WALSH. Now, then, can the gentleman state if it is going to interfere in any way with the adjudication of these claims by giving this agent down there, or the superintendent, practically final jurisdiction?

Mr. HASTINGS. This only does that in uncontested claims and in uncontested leases. For instance, if the gentleman does not fully understand, these leases are really made on blank forms. The bonds are made on blank forms. The Indian superintendents there have their oil inspectors, who go out and make investigation and report as to the bonus and other details. They see that it is all in proper form.

Now, then, when a man leases some land he makes arrangements for some money with which to do the drilling. It costs from $3,000 to $5,000 to drill a well, so that it costs from $50,000 to $75,000 to drill up a tract of land. This only applies when there is no contest, when there is an agreement between the lessor and lessee, and where the amount of the bonus is satisfactory. It permits the superintendent there to approve it, rather than some clerk in the department up here in Washington.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And if the gentleman will permit me, it permits an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior by an aggrieved person within 30 days.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it permits an appeal. But with this language in the bill it requires that those leases should be sent to Washington and not passed upon by the superintendent?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is true.

Mr. WALSH. Why was that done? For what reason?

Mr. HASTINGS. That was in the old law, 15 or 20 years ago, when these agreements were made, all claims had to be sent to Washington. If you bought a pair of ponies out there with a restricted Indian's money, or if you bought groceries, it had to be approved. What we want to do is to allow the uncontested claims to be passed upon by the Federal representatives. They are not elected by the people of Oklahoma; I mean they are not elected officials in Oklahoma; but they are Federal employees, and the superintendent is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and all these employees are civil-service employees, just like these down in the Indian Office. They are the same grade of men. They have the same degree of capacity, and they have the same information before them, and this only applies to uncontested matters. What we want to do is to reduce this clerical force and allow the uncontested claims to be passed upon by the Federal representatives there.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, there are a great many of these oil and gas leases?

Mr. HASTINGS. They are forwarded up here, and this office has no further information than what they have down there and the report that is forwarded along with the leases. The result is that when a lease is taken, when it is sent up here, it requires a certain time to come through the mail and go through the office here. It used to take, before we speeded them up, all the way from 30 days to 6 months to get a lease approved. It does not take that long now, but it does take some time and considerable delay.

Mr. WALSH. That is considerable expedition, considering the facility, or lack of it, with which we get our mail. [Laughter.]

Now, the point I am making, or attempting to make, is that with these oil and gas leases constituting a greater part of the business of this agency down there, a great many of these leases relating to oil and gas, you are giving this superintendent the authority to either pay them or reject them, or approve them or disapprove them, and the same in the case of mineral and agricultural leases. Is not that so?

Mr. HASTINGS. Those that are uncontested.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose that is synonymous with "undisputed" claims. Now, striking out "including oil and gas leases," that includes them in "agricultural and mineral" leases, I assume?

Mr. HASTINGS. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. There are a great number of them, are there not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Last year there were about 1,400 according to this report that I have in my hand.

Mr. WALSH. The only result, probably, will be that the additional employees who are now required in the Indian Office in Washington will be dismissed here and transferred there and be hitched onto the pay roll down there.

Mr. HASTINGS. No; they will not need a single additional employee down there.

Mr. WALSH. Do you think the superintendent there, with his present force, can handle these things?

Mr. HASTINGS. Unquestionably. This is just a duplication of work. And let me say that I have here the report of the superintendent from down there, and it shows that he mailed to the department last year 7,475 letters, or 25 letters a day, and that he received from the department 6,842 letters, or an average of 22 a day from the department.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that the gentleman says he mailed that number of letters. I assume from the gentleman's previous statement that a large proportion of them have not yet got to Washington. But the superintendent down there will have to examine all these claims——

Mr. HASTINGS. He does now.

Mr. WALSH. I thought all he did now was just to transfer them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon. He and those under him make the only real investigation that is made. The action is necessarily pro forma when it gets here. Down there they investigate, they pass upon the amount of the bonus, they pass upon all the forms of the lease, they pass upon the bond, they pass upon everything that is necessary to pass upon, so that when it is sent up here it is pro forma, and all this office has got is the report they make upon it from down there.

Mr. WALSH. So what the gentleman seeks to eliminate is the pro forma action here in Washington?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; and the duplication of work and the delay——

Mr. WALSH. And the duplication of work here in Washington?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; in the uncontested cases.

Mr. WALSH. Except where there may be an appeal?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes. Wherever a man is aggrieved I want him to have the right of appeal, and this does not take it away from him.

Mr. WALSH. Was there any peculiar reason why these oil and gas leases should have been excluded from the provision relating to agricultural and mineral leases?

Mr. HASTINGS. None other than I have stated. Away back yonder, when all these agreements were made, the department here retained supervision over all restricted allottees—over the payment of their claims, over agricultural leases, over the disbursement of their money, over the approval of their oil and gas leases, and over everything.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. But subsequent to the remote days when that provision prevailed we provided that agricultural and mineral leases which were uncontested and undisputed might be passed upon by the superintendent, and we excluded oil and gas leases. But now you are coming in and putting oil and gas leases back with the others. I am trying to find out if there must not have been some peculiar reason why these two classes of claims or leases were kept out of the general provision of the law.

Mr. HASTINGS To be frank with the gentleman, the department is always opposed to giving up jurisdiction. None of these departments here ever want to give up any jurisdiction. They want to hold on to all the leases down there and, for that matter, on every other Indian reservation. The provision of last year was a Senate amendment. It was a step in the right direction. It was a step giving them more authority down there to aid them in more expeditious action, to attend to their affairs better, to wind up their affairs more quickly, and this is just one additional step; but it does not take any supervision away from any restricted Indian whatever. It retains it all in the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and under a Federal official in Oklahoma. The work that is done here is simply a duplication.

Mr. WALSH. It is a duplication of a very important branch of the work; but the gentleman does not hold out much hope that it is going to reduce the force here in Washington.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am sure it ought to in the years to come.

Mr. WALSH. If it does it will be one of the miracles of 1919 that by this minor amendment you separate from the Federal pay roll here in Washington any of these employees who are down in the Indian Bureau working on business such as this at the present time.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I notice that in this large assemblage of not more than 25 Members, of whom a majority are members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, it is proposed now to strike out of the bill something which was placed in it for the protection of the Indians. As I recall, this provision was incorporated in this bill last year for the sake of assisting the Indians, to relieve them of unnecessary red tape in matters which were rather inconsequential. Now, it is proposed that these Indian agents in the field shall have full authority to pass upon every character of lease that is entered into by an unrestricted Indian, involving millions and millions of dollars. This exception, excluding oil and gas leases, was placed in the bill deliberately last year for the protection of the Indians. I know the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] is most insistent on trying to have the reviewing power of the Indian Bureau lifted as to all the matters pertaining to Indian affairs. He had a bill reported granting to the Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes absolute authority to pass on all of these leases and not have them at all subject to review. It is purposed to really break the agreement that we had a year ago that as far as leases pertaining to oil and gas were concerned it was necessary that they should be reviewed by the department here before they became effective. I certainly hope that the committee will not go to the extreme of removing the protection that is necessary in these important leases involving millions and millions of dollars.

If the chairman of the committee and other Members are desirous of passing on this amendment, I think we had better have a quorum present to consider this important piece of legislation. It is unfair to the committee, after having reported the bill, to have Members come in here and take the very vitals out of it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I confess to not having any great omniscient knowledge with reference to oil and gas leases, because the oil and gas leases in my part of the State have taken place within a few years, since I came to Congress. As I understand, all this proposes to do is to provide that uncontested leases shall not be sent to Washington for approval. In other words, the superintendent who makes the examination, whose men practically employed by him make the investigation, the man who reports to him, the superintendent who looks the contracting parties in the face across the table, is the man to whom final jurisdiction is given in the settlement of oil and gas leases, with the exception that any aggrieved party may within 30 days appeal to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purpose of saying here that these unrestricted Indians, presumably not being qualified to enter into a contract of sale, or enter into an agreement of lease as to oil and gas rights, who has leased his land for oil and gas does not wish to contest it that it shall be final——

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no; it is not final.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It does not do that; it provides that the Indian may enter into a contract subject to investigation and approval by the superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes at Muscogee, but it does not take away any jurisdiction of the Government from the Indian.

Mr. STAFFORD. It takes away the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, which exercises a supervisory review that is absolutely necessary.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is wrong when he states that unless the Indian appeals the matter it becomes final.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; it is subject to review by the superintendent. Is not the gentleman attempting to accomplish by the amendment what was proposed by the bill introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], giving the superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes full authority to pass finally on all questions relating to these tribes, which had such strong opposition from the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Indian Rights' Association?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman will not let us settle one point before he raises another. What does the bill say? Any party aggrieved—not the Indian himself—but any party aggrieved may appeal to the Secretary of the Interior. With reference to what the gentleman says about certain interests being opposed to this measure, some are opposed to it, and they were opposed to the general bill which took jurisdiction away from the Secretary of the Interior of all Indian matters and placed it in the Muscogee bureau. We have had these interests against many things which Congress has done. All we propose to do here is to give the superintendent at Muscogee jurisdiction to approve uncontested leases where there is no appeal—to give him jurisdiction with the right of appeal, and if that will do any violence to the Indian I am frank to say to the House that I do not know it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of some surprise to me that this motion should be made, and at the same time it is not. Last year the gentlemen from Oklahoma who are interested in this matter started their attempt to remove as far as possible the jurisdiction over the Oklahoma Indians from Washington supervision. They found at that time that the only way they could accomplish anything was by accepting a provision such as that which has been reported by the committee this year. It was proposed at that time—a year ago—to go to the extent that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] proposes to go now; but the possibilities that are opened up by placing the Indians profiting by oil and gas leases entirely at the mercy of local influences are so great the gentlemen last year found that they could not get anything if they insisted on that, and so they accepted the provision as reported, which expressly exempts the oil leases. This year the committee reports out the same provision that they accepted then, and now the gentlemen, not content with what Congress gave them then, want to go still further; and if the gentlemen from Oklahoma will remember, I prophesied at the time that it was only the beginning and that it would be followed by efforts on the part of Oklahoma gentlemen to leave the control of these Indians without any interference from Washington. The mere fact that the provision is included that an appeal may be taken by interested parties is nothing when you consider the matter may be between some sharper, perhaps a white man, and a poor Indian who does not know his rights and is willing to sell his birthright for a mess of pottage.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman tell the committee of this House how many uncontested leases that have been sent to Washington from the Muscogee Indian bureau with the recommendation of the Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes have been refused approval?

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman is well aware that I am not in a position to state.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I will say that not one.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not in a position to give the gentleman the information on that point, but what the gentleman proposes here is opposed by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Indian Rights' Association, and every other agency interested in the Indians outside of Oklahoma.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Why? Simply because it will deprive the bureau here of a few jobs. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

Mr. CRAMTON. If we were to put it on that plane, I might say that it was the desire to provide a few more jobs in Oklahoma.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Not a single one.

Mr. CRAMTON. But I prefer to put it on the basis of removing the welfare of the Indians from local interest and greed as far as possible.

Mr. HASTINGS. Every one of these officers in Oklahoma is a Federal employee and every one of them except the superintendent is under the civil service. They are all Federal employees; they are not elected down there. The superintendent is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. CRAMTON. But they are in Oklahoma, in constant contact with Oklahoma sentiment and Oklahoma influence, subject to the influence of what I suppose prevails in Oklahoma as in every other State, greed and desire to take from those who can not well protect themselves everything that they have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the Chair expressed himself in doubt.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. [After counting.] Seventy-one Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ashbrook	Emerson	Kiess, Pa.	Sabath

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum he directed the roll to be called, when 300 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he submitted the names of the absentees for printing in the Journal.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose for want of a quorum the committee was voting on an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], and the Chair will direct that the amendment be again read.

The Clerk again reported the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 125, noes 8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of the language beginning with the words "Provided further," in line 24, page 42, down to and ending with the paragraph on line 14, page 43.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 42, line 24, strike out the following language:

"Provided further, That hereafter no part of said appropriation shall be used in forwarding the undisputed claims to be paid from individual moneys of restricted allottees, or their heirs, or in forwarding uncontested agricultural and mineral leases, excluding oil and gas leases, made by individual restricted Indian allottees, or their heirs, to the Secretary of the Interior for approval, but all such undisputed claims or uncontested leases, except oil and gas leases, now required to be approved under existing law by the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid, approved, rejected, or disapproved by the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma: Provided, however, That any party aggrieved by any decision or order of the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma may appeal from the same to the Secretary of the Interior within 30 days from the date of said decision or order."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, until the Indian bill of a year ago took effect all claims and leases entered into by members of the Five Civilized Tribes must be forwarded to Washington for final approval. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] had introduced bills to change that procedure and transfer the final approval to Oklahoma and put the matter in the hands of the Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes. There was very strenuous opposition to that proposition upon the part of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Indian Rights' Association, and others interested in the welfare of the Indians. Finally the provision was passed permitting the final approval by the superintendent in Oklahoma of all undisputed claims and of all agricultural and mineral leases, excluding oil and gas leases. This year the Committee on Indian Affairs upon the 20th of January reported this appropriation bill for next year, and they approved in that bill and repeated the identical language agreed upon last year and passed by Congress.

And although that bill was reported to this House so recently as four days ago it develops now in this House, which had the right to believe that that bill represented the views of the Committee on Indian Affairs, that it did not, but that the Committee on Indian Affairs, instead of approving what they had reported to the House, approve now of a sled-length proposition by which not only uncontested claims and mineral and agricultural leases other than oil and gas leases shall have their final approval in Oklahoma, but that hereafter the final approval of the immensely valuable oil and gas leases in the hands of the Five Civilized Tribes shall also finally be approved in Oklahoma. I say to the gentlemen of the House that that was an unfair advantage that the Committee on Indian Affairs took of the House. We had a right to rely upon the report of the committee on a matter of that kind, which had been thrashed over for two or three years in this House, and on which finally last year an agreement had been reached. And now, since the House has amended that proviso, so as to cut out the exemption of oil and gas leases, I appeal to the Committee of the Whole to strike out the whole proposition. And let me call your attention to one or two things. If you retain the language in the bill which is there now, it means that these oil and gas leases held by the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma, that represent millions of dollars, that are owned by people whom this Government says have not the capacity to be trusted with the administration of those millions; that those leases, affecting such immensely valuable deposits, shall finally be acted upon out in Oklahoma. And by whom? By the Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes. Some claim that these are civil-service employees who will act on those claims. The Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes is not a civil-service employee; he is a political appointee of the administration that happens to be in power.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. When I am through. He is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and when a new administration takes office a new superintendent may be appointed and the man in time is bound to be subject to Oklahoma influence. I say it is a very unwise policy. I thought it was an unwise policy to enter upon a year ago, and it does seem unwise to go further and place in the hands of a local political appointee these claims that represent millions of dollars.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman explain to the committee in what way the appointment of this Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes differs from the appointment of the Chief of the Indian Bureau here, or the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; I will. The Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes is an Oklahoma proposition, surrounded by Oklahoma influence, and not only the performance of his duties, the administration of his office, but his very appointment is influenced from Oklahoma, whereas—if the gentleman will pardon me—the Secretary of the Interior and the head of the Bureau of Indian Affairs are not Oklahoma appointees, and are not subject to the influence on every hand surrounding the Indians of Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. They represent the sentiment of the whole country, not merely those who are making something out of the Indians of Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I ask that the gentleman be given five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAMTON. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Now, I do not know whether the gentleman has read that part of the hearings or not in which the Commissioner of Indian Affairs himself stated that the Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes was a personal appointee of the Secretary of the Interior; that no man from Oklahoma had anything to do with his appointment or knew that his appointment was to be made until it had already been decided upon.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would say to the gentleman that a year ago I read all of these hearings, but due to the surprise that comes with a change from the bill reported by the committee and the presentation of an amendment entirely different I have not read them this year. But I will say to the gentleman, notwithstanding the fact the Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes—and I am not making an attack upon that gentleman—notwithstanding the fact that he is an appointee of the President, as are the present Secretary of the Interior, and, I understand from the gentleman, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs—notwithstanding that, both of those officials who are charged by the Nation with the administration of the affairs of the Indians objected to this kind of legislation. And, further, what the gentleman is entering on to-day is permanent legislation in effect, and the gentleman can not guarantee that to-morrow or next year or the next administration we will have the same Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will recall——

Mr. CRAMTON. And who, in any event, is out in Oklahoma immediately surrounded, continually surrounded, by this influence.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will refresh his memory, he will recall——

Mr. CRAMTON. I would have been glad to have had an opportunity to refresh my memory if the committee had given it to me.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman can refresh it right now, and he will recall that last year when this proposition was up the gentleman himself made a point of order, and the Chair held this was not permanent legislation.

Mr. CRAMTON. I insist, and I will admit further that this present language is not permanent legislation; but I say in effect it is, because you will find when you once get one of these things incorporated in an appropriation bill it is not only almost impossible to hold it where it is but almost impossible to prevent them from grabbing more and more. A year ago, after a lot of fighting, the gentlemen got what is in the bill, and they come in now and seek to go miles beyond it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman was opposed to what we put in the bill a year ago?

Mr. CRAMTON. I was.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Was he opposed to it this session?

Mr. CRAMTON. I was opposed to it the last time because, as I said to the House, it was an entering wedge.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Was the gentleman opposed to it this year?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman could very easily have prevented all this trouble by having been on the floor of the House and made a point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I gave consideration to that fact, but I knew it would be unavailing. The Senate would put back the same thing and perhaps they would put more with it, and I thought it was better, inasmuch as the committee had accepted it, and I understood the Bureau of Indian Affairs were content with the old language, not to impede the progress of things. Therefore I let it go. But I did not know that in the four days since your committee approved this language you had vitally altered and changed it by approving the Hastings amendment. And, having done so, I appeal to this House to strike out the whole proviso.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Michigan permit a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the reputed value of this oil and gas?

Mr. CRAMTON. It runs into many millions of dollars, and is in the hands of those who are the wards not of Oklahoma but of the Nation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And it is proposed by this bill as now amended to turn over the leasing of the property of those Indians—in effect the disposal of it—so that there will be no supervision by a central authority here in Washington, the Secretary of the Interior, who represents all the people, but supervision only by a minor official in the State of Oklahoma?

Mr. CRAMTON. Absolutely; and a political appointee.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I wish to deny that accusation. It is approved by a man appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate, and who draws the same salary that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs does.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Perhaps the gentleman who has just addressed the House——

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Is not the Commissioner of Indian Affairs a political appointee?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have already gone over that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Oklahoma who interrupted apparently does not understand what I meant by use of the word "minor." The Secretary of the Interior, a Cabinet officer, in his official capacity represents all of the people of the United States in the matter of superintending the leasing of this immensely valuable property, but that official in Oklahoma is a minor official in spite of the indignant denial of the gentleman from Oklahoma who has just taken his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Victor M. Locke the sum of $1,290.26 as balance in full due him for salary and expenses as principal chief of the Choctaw Nation.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on this paragraph. Can the gentleman give some explanation of this and tell us why it should go in on this appropriation bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The chief of the Choctaw Nation, Mr. Victor M. Locke, joined the Army some time last year. While he was in training, as I recall, and before he got his commission as an Army officer, the commissioner decided, because he was away from the nation and because he was in the Army, he could not discharge the function of principal chief of the Choctaw Nation, whose principal function is the signing of deeds and representing them in Washington. And so after a certain length of time he appointed another man. That left an interim, during which he decided the chief was entitled to pay and for which time he had not been removed from office. But I understand that that has not been paid. Whether it was the trouble with the comptroller or bureau, I am not able to say, because I have not had time to investigate the matter. It was first brought to me while the bill was being prepared, and I told the chief that I would put it in and present it to the House. I think if he rendered the service he ought to have the pay.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand he was the chief and that he went into the Army, and that from that time until another was appointed occurs this interim for which you seek to pay him in this bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is my understanding.

Mr. FOSTER. Did he perform any services during this time?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think so. I think he performed all the functions of the office.

Mr. FOSTER. Is he still in service?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. He is in the Army now.

Mr. FOSTER. In this country?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In this country. He was in the National Guard before the war.

Mr. FOSTER. And this was pay to him if he rendered some service?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; that is what I said. He is a pretty square-toed young fellow.

Mr. FOSTER. He could not get his money because he was not at the headquarters of the tribe?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. He could not get his money, I understand, because of some controversy between him and the commissioner at that time. After he had joined the Army, I think, the commissioner had first refused to submit some matters to him.

Perhaps some statement like that was passed back and forth at that time, but afterwards the young man did perform some of the functions of chief, as he told me, while he was in training for a commission, and he went back and forth from his home to the training camp all the time.

Mr. FOSTER. He could not draw pay from the Government as an Army officer?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Up until the time he got his commission he might have drawn from the Government at that time a private's pay?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. He might have drawn his pay in the Army.

Mr. FOSTER. He drew a private's pay up to the time he received his commission?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What is his salary as chief?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Two thousand dollars. This includes his salary and expenses in traveling back and forth.

Mr. FOSTER. How long was that?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Five or six months. That included his traveling back and forth from his training camp to his tribe's reservation.

Mr. FOSTER. So that he was trying to perform that service?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Oh, undoubtedly. There is no doubt in the world about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that this is a claim for the salary after he was notified by the commissioner that he was ineligible to act in that capacity?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I would not be sure about that. There was a controversy between him and the Secretary of the Interior. I never saw the correspondence. He explained it to me while I was on my sick bed. At first the department considered him not to be chief of the tribe, but afterwards I think they recognized him, and he performed the functions of chief of the tribe.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the department recommended the payment of this claim?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No. It came in only a few days ago, and there was no time for the submission of a report. It provides here that it is directed to be paid, and so forth. It ought to be paid from the tribal funds of the Choctaw Nation. I do not think there would be any objection from the Choctaw officials.

Mr. STAFFORD. This matter should be submitted to the review of the department. I think, Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances the matter should have further consideration, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. No; it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to reoffer for sale between September 15, 1919, and November 15, 1919, the unsold and forfeited tracts of coal and asphalt land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations upon the same terms and conditions as provided in the act of February 8, 1918 (Public, No. 98, 65th Cong.).

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan reserves a point of order on the paragraph. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; I would be glad to. That is the paragraph providing for the sale of coal and asphalt. The present law provides that the deposits may be sold after the expiration of one year from the date of the original sale, to be offered for resale. The original sale took place December 14. After December 14 is not a very good time to sell coal and asphalt deposits in our country.

Mr. CRAMTON. What year was that?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Nineteen hundred and eighteen. The law providing for the sale of coal and asphalt deposits provided that there should be a sale and that at the expiration of one year after the date of the first sale the deposits should again be offered for sale upon the same terms and conditions, and so forth, as in the first sale. That would make the next sale come, perhaps, some time in next January, or a year from next February—a bad time to sell coal deposits, and these are mostly coal deposits. This provision is merely to move the date up so that the Secretary may sell it at a time when coal deposits are really worth more than they are at the other time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, having recently been chided by the chairman of the committee for not having made a point of order—and the reason I did not make it being that I relied upon the committee—he will pardon me if I call attention to the fact that the language in question refers to "unsold and unforfeited tracts of coal and asphalt land," whereas the law that is referred to only refers to deposits. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will change the amendment if the gentleman will not make a point of order on that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Perhaps the gentleman will explain how such a vital change in the law was attempted in this amendment.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It would not affect the land. The surface of the land is already sold.

Mr. CRAMTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman permit the amendment to go through as to deposits? We do not care about the surface of the land. We want these lands sold, if the gentleman will permit, at the time when they will bring the most to the Indians. I assume that the department will not have any objection to this. It was not submitted to the department, but I know they will appreciate having it done.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why does the committee emphasize the decision by making it mandatory? Why should it not be discretionary? Is there any reason why it should be made directory in these times?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will say to the gentleman, if he will yield, that we will appreciate the utmost frankness from the committee.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman has never had anything but the utmost frankness from me and from the committee, and the gentleman knows it. If the gentleman will permit a perfectly frank statement from me, I will say that I was sick and one of my friends offered to draw this amendment, and not, perhaps, having the bill before him at the time, he referred to the lands instead of the deposits. Perhaps that is the reason why the amendment was not drawn in accordance with the ideas of the gentleman from Wisconsin, because it is along the lines that the House generally desires to travel.

Mr. STAFFORD. Should the date be fixed mandatorily or left to the discretion of the Secretary? Does not the gentleman believe that it should be left to the discretion of the Secretary?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think the coal deposits ought to be sold in the fall of the year. If you wait until January to make those sales, then you come to the time of year when every coal man is going out of business or closing up some of his mines, and not looking to further development, but to contracting it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose that exceptional conditions should prevail at that time. Should we direct that it be done?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I think the Secretary will do it anyway.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not authorize and permit him to do so? Why not make it merely permissive?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think it should be directory. We had some difficulty in getting any of these deposits disposed of during any period, and my idea was that the way to get something done in any period was to direct it rather than to suggest it. I think the hearings will show that I suggested direction myself. I think that was the best period in which to sell these deposits. And I want to say further that it was my understanding that that word should be "deposits" and not "lands." I am surprised on reading it to see that it is "lands" and not "deposits."

Mr. HASTINGS. That is a clerical error in drawing it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am directing attention more particularly to the prescribed time within which this sale shall take place. The gentleman is a business man. He knows that conditions may change from time to time, especially during this period of readjustment. If the period between September 15 and November 15 should not be a suitable time, why should we compel the Secretary to offer them for sale at that time?

Mr. SNYDER. I am perfectly willing to reduce it.

Mr. HASTINGS. The committee deferred to the judgment of the chairman of the committee [Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma]. For years he was coal trustee and had charge of the coal lands down there in the Choctaw Nation, and was therefore more familiar with it than any other member of the committee. We deferred to his judgment, and he thought that it would bring more for the Choctaw Tribe if sold between these dates than if sold in January or February. There is not a bit of change in this act of February 8, 1918—none whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. You do not intend to strike anything else out, so as to affect the vitals?

Mr. HASTINGS. There is not a change in the law. But under this act of February 8, 1918, these lands, or deposits, rather, were offered for sale between December 11 and 14 of this last year. Now, the act of February 8, 1918, says immediately after one year after they have been offered for sale. So that you can see that under the act of February 8, 1918, they could not be sold until after a year had expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, it does not say that one year after they have been offered for sale they shall again be offered for sale, but that the Secretary shall readvertise a year after they have been offered for sale. So it would not be just a year. And, furthermore——

Mr. HASTINGS. After the time has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. And, furthermore, it says after the expiration of six months he can readvertise again. Now, the committee in their amendment propose to tie the hands of the Secretary and to provide that it shall be construed that he can only offer to sell between September 15 and November 15, 1919, instead of giving the several options that prevailed in the original law.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That has just occurred to me, and I have an amendment to cover those phases, which I will send to the desk to have read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Read for information.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I offer the following amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order pending. Does the gentleman from Michigan withdraw the point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, no.

Mr. DYER. Then I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma: Page 47, in place of the paragraph between lines 5 and 11, insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to reoffer for sale, between September 15, 1919, and November 15, 1919, the unsold and forfeited tracts of coal and asphalt deposits in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nation upon the same terms and conditions as provided in the act of February 8, 1918 (Public, No. 98, 65th Cong.): Provided, That this act shall not prohibit other sales as provided by existing law."

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will ask the Clerk to make that "authorized by existing law."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order upon that amendment, may I ask the gentleman—I was trying to follow the amendment—does it say "deposits" in the unsold and forfeited tracts?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Let us have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CRAMTON. Still further reserving the point of order, is the gentleman sure that the amendment suggested by him would involve due advertising as provided in the law?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It says "upon the same terms and conditions." I think that covers it completely.

Mr. CRAMTON. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all claims against the Creek and Seminole Nations, including claims to unpaid per capita and equalization money, which may now be paid under existing law out of the respective funds of the Creek and Seminole Nations in the Treasury of the United States or otherwise in the hands of the Government, shall be filed, not later than one year from the date of the approval of this act, with the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes or such other persons as the Secretary of the Interior may designate, and under such rules and regulations as said Secretary of the Interior may prescribe to govern the filing, determining, and settlement of said claims, and the claims so submitted and filed shall be considered and adjudicated under said rules and regulations not later than six months after the expiration of the time above limited for the filing of the claims, and shall, if approved by the Secretary of the Interior, be paid out of the respective tribal funds of the Creek and Seminole Nations.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order, and I ask the committee whether the House may take it that that language is in the form the committee desires it, or is it proposed to offer amendments that will strike out the reviewing power of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. HASTINGS. It is not the purpose of the committee to offer any amendment to this. It is in the form that the committee desire. It is in the exact language of the amendment with reference to the Cherokee Nation of last year, except that the words "Creek and Seminole" are placed in there, and it does not make any disposition of the money. The gentleman will remember that last year we gave the money to a school. This year it does not make any disposition of the money. It holds it as tribal money.

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall make a point of order against the paragraph unless it is understood that I shall have the support of the committee in retaining the reviewing power in the Secretary of the Interior, as recommended by the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. No amendment is contemplated by any member of the committee.

Mr. CRAMTON. And I will have the gentleman's aid to retain that language?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, last year I believe the gentleman from Oklahoma, who was very urgent in advocacy of the adoption of this amendment, stated that there were only a few claims outstanding against the Cherokee Nation, and that their affairs should be brought to a close and the claimants known. What is the status as to claims against the Creek and Seminole Nation?

Mr. HASTINGS. They are similarly situated. This one involves little remnants or fractional claims, and it does not debar anyone. This places a year's limitation with which they can come and assert and get their rights and have all claims paid that can now be paid under existing law. It does not allow any of the claims to be paid, it does not create any new rights.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me ask the gentleman, are the affairs of the Creeks and Seminole Indians being wound up?

Mr. HASTINGS. They are practically all wound up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: On page 48, after the period, in line 4, insert new paragraph, to read as follows:

"Whenever requested by adult members of the Five Civilized Tribes, who by reason of their degree of Indian blood belong to the restricted class, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to offer for sale to the highest bidder at public auction, after due advertisement of the same, such parcels of lands described in said request, under such rules and regulations as he may promulgate: Provided, That restricted members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes shall retain at least 80 acres of their allotments, and that members of the Creek, Seminole, and Cherokee Tribes shall retain at least 40 acres of their allotments, to be designated by them and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, as a homestead: Provided, That persons who become bona fide residents upon said lands may purchase the same upon installments of interest and principal payable annually for a period of not less than 5 years nor to exceed 40 years: Provided, That the money accruing from the sale of said lands of the said restricted Indians be paid to and be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior, to be disbursed in his discretion for the use and benefit of such restricted Indians: Provided further, That said moneys when paid to said restricted members or their heirs shall be exempt from any lien for attorneys' fee or other debt contracted prior to the disbursing of the same."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Secretary of the Interior has already advanced an idea for readjustment in this country to protect the returning soldiers and encourage them in farm ownership. I say without fear of contradiction that one of the greatest menaces to America to-day is the lack of opportunity to the homeless man, especially to tenants upon the farms, who have no chance to own their homes. In Oklahoma in my district I am safe in saying that there are 25,000 tenants living on the farms, farming for the other man, in houses that are not fit to live in, and under conditions that drive men to desperation and force them to believe that their Government has abandoned them and that they have no chance in the world.

In my home county there are at least 2,700 farms upon which reside hundreds of tenant farmers. In Seminole County, which comprises the Seminole Nation, there are at least 2,700 farms with 2,100 tenants. I say it is appalling. Why is this condition? Because the Indian landlords who own the land are restricted and can not sell the land. He is restricted in making leases or contracts, and can only make a contract for one year on his homestead. You men who have observed the farmers know that a man who lives on land for one year, tills it, with no expectation of being there another year, will farm it with one idea in view, and that is to get out of the land all he can in that one year, and will leave the land in such condition that it will wash away. In 20 years the land of these Indians will be washed away and worn out and their own lands will be unimproved.

In the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations there is an average of 320 acres allotted to each man, woman, and child. A number of these Indians are not farmers and they live back in the country on a little piece of land, and all these 360 acres for the man, for his wife, and for his child is farmed by tenant farmers. Do you wonder that in that country there were riots and people resisted the Government when it was trying to carry out the selective-draft law? It is because of their condition. I say to you that when you tie a man to the soil of his country you tie him to the flag of his country. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I want to say to you that there are in these nations now 2,888,000 acres of land that is restricted. I, for one, am opposed to taking away from the Indian his homestead and his right to have something. I do not belong to any class of citizens in Oklahoma who favor any such doctrine. In my country these farmers want to buy the land, but they have no chance. Men come in from Illinois, Kansas, and Nebraska, from the best farming countries in the United States, where they have started as tenant farmers, and out of the fertile lands have accumulated money enough to buy a little home. They have heard of the fertile lands of Oklahoma, and they come down there thinking to have an opportunity to own a home upon which they can live. They start in to rent to see how they like the country. They have no chanee to buy. I say to you that the procedure that too frequently prevails is for a speculator to go in and buy land at $20 and $25 an acre, turn around the same day and sell it on time to an actual farmer to live on for $30, $40, or $50 an acre on long time. To my knowledge the department has never sold any land in the Indian country on longer terms than three years. So I say that the Secretary of the Interior should be given this chance to put in actual practice his idea and give the men an opportunity to own their own homes. Let him offer for sale such lands as he may be requested to sell by these Indians. Of course, he could not sell the land unless the Indian wanted him to sell it, and he could not sell all the land if the Indian asked him to. I say we ought to turn our attention to this matter now.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman, and I think it is very important. I should like to have him explain what his amendment proposes to do. I heard it read, but I did not catch it.

Mr. McKEOWN. I will explain. My proposition is that in these nations there are 23,441 members of these tribes who are restricted on account of the quantum of their Indian blood; that is to say, they can not sell their lands without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. I do not want to take away from the Secretary of the Interior his power, because the worst thing that has ever been done to the Indians is to pass a law removing the restrictions on account of the quantum of Indian blood. When you pass a law of that kind he often becomes the prey of grafters who take away from him his land without giving him even the pot of porridge.

My amendment proposes that if any adult Indian in the restricted class shall request the Secretary of the Interior to sell any of his lands, the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations to be promulgated by himself, shall sell at public auction to the highest bidder on terms of not less than 5 years or more than 40 years. They have been selling some lands, but the terms have been too short—three years—and they can not meet those terms. Here has been the procedure: They would advertise the land for sale by bids, not hold a public auction where every man can come and know and see and have an opportunity to buy. My amendment proposes that they would offer the tracts of land for sale at a certain day. The men who live on the land, and other men who want to come in from other States and buy the land, could come and bid on the land, and if a man bid in the land and became a bona fide settler on the land he could have not less than 5 years nor more than 40 years in which to pay for it in annual installments, principal and interest.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I would state to the gentleman that I at one time had reported and had consideration started by the House of a measure somewhat similar to this, although a little more liberally drawn. The question I wanted to ask the gentleman is this: Does he think it is quite fair to the Indian to make him wait 40 years for the payment of his land?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will say to the gentleman that under my amendment I am not fixing the terms. The Indian, when he asks to sell his land, will fix up the terms, and if he wants to sell it he must give at least 5 years and he may agree to the longer terms. As I understand it, the Indian owns this land and no act of Congress can take it away from him or can take away his constitutional rights.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman cherish any hopes that any Indian will ever make application to sell his lands payable in 40 years?

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not think so, but in the meantime we have a very fine organization over here known as the Farm Loan Board that has money to loan for 40-year periods, and in the meantime the man ought to be able to negotiate his land if the Indian has any objection to selling it for 40 years.

Mr. PLATT. But a man can not borrow through the Farm Loan Association until he gets title to his property.

Mr. McKEOWN. No; but under this amendment the procedure of the department is this: They pass title to the purchaser and take back a mortgage on the land. That does two things. It puts the land on the tax roll, whereas it would not be on the tax roll otherwise, and if it did not pass the title the land would be held for the taxpayer until 1931.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. What authority would the Secretary of the Interior have to approve the sale of these lands under this amendment that he does not have now?

Mr. McKEOWN. The Secretary of the Interior does have that power now, and I am not conferring any new power upon him. The only thing I am trying to do with my amendment is to inaugurate a plan so that it can not be said that he does not have the authority. When we ask him to give long terms he can do so on this authority.

Mr. MORGAN. Then it is a question of terms?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I do not think the gentleman's amendment is quite specific enough, but, of course, that can be remedied; but if the gentleman will change the time of his amendment from 5 to 10 years I shall not interpose any objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Take the question of tenancy. I am afraid the gentleman's amendment would not be sufficient to have much to do in changing these titles, to help those tenants. How would it be to have the Government of the United States, under the direction of Secretary Lane—under his plan, for instance—take over a certain proportion of these lands and sell them to anyone who wished to buy them and retain the proceeds in trust for the benefit of the Indians, reserving a small homestead always for each Indian? Would not that facilitate changing the country from a country of tenants to a country of home owners, and must not something of that kind be done before any real remedy comes about?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will say to the gentleman that it is a long way around to the point where we could purchase these lands by the Government. I have no objection to the idea, but I want action now.

Mr. MORGAN. Why would it not be as well to take these lands as swamp lands of the South or the cut-over timberlands of the North.

Mr. McKEOWN. I do not want to get into a discussion of that matter at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The Chair thinks that it is clearly legislation and not in order on an appropriation bill, and sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of Indians at Grande Ronde and Siletz Agencies, Oreg., including pay of employees, $4,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that there has been an error in the print. The item just read, beginning on line 5 and running to line 7, page 48, is an Oregon item, and should come under the heading "Oregon," which comes immediately below that, in line 8. I ask unanimous consent that the language in the lines 5 to 7 be transposed so as to come below the title "Oregon."

Mr. MANN. That item came in the last year's bill at what would be the bottom of the page. Why not put it in the same place?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to insert the language, in lines 5, 6, and 7, to come in the bill after line 24.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma withdraws his request, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] requests that the language contained in lines 5, 6, and 7 of the bill be transposed and be inserted after line 24 of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux of Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota: For pay of five teachers, one physician, one carpenter, one miller, one engineer, two farmers, and one blacksmith (art. 13, treaty of Apr. 29, 1868), $10,400; for pay of second blacksmith, and furnishing iron, steel, and other material (art. 8 of same treaty), $1,600; for pay of additional employees of the several agencies for the Sioux in Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota, $95,000; for subsistence of the Sioux and for purposes of their civilization (act of Feb. 28, 1877), $200,000: Provided, That this sum shall include transportation of supplies from the termination of railroad or steamboat transportation, and in this service Indians shall be employed whenever practicable; in all, $307,000.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language in the paragraph just read, wherein these words are found:

For the support of Sioux of different tribes, including Santee Sioux of Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota.

Why does that language restrict the Indians who are to be the beneficiaries under this appropriation to the Santee Sioux of those three States, and why does it not include the Santee Sioux Indians of Minnesota?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am inviting the attention of the gentleman to the language in the beginning of the paragraph just read, wherein we find these words:

For the support of Sioux of different tribes, including the Santee Sioux of Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota.

Why are the beneficiaries under this proposed appropriation limited to the Santee Sioux of those three States, and why does it not include the Santee Sioux of Minnesota?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, the gentleman will observe that it is a treaty item.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is what I wanted to inquire about.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And, as the gentleman knows, treaty items usually follow the exact direction of the treaty. I have not examined to see whether this does so or not, but when the department presented it I assume the committee took that view of it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, the language there makes it somewhat doubtful whether the treaty restricts the beneficiaries, namely, to those branches of the Santee Sioux living in those three States. It may be that the treaty does so restrict it, but, frankly, I do not know——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It may be that there is something in a subsequent law which excluded those three branches of the Sioux; and if that were true, this language would be necessary to reinstate them.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think the gentleman can find a treaty anywhere that groups the Santee Sioux of Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota and omits the Santee Sioux of Minnesota. My recollection of that is this—and if I am wrong, I would like to be put right—the Santee Sioux of Nebraska came up there because they or their ancestors were transferred from Minnesota in 1862 and 1863, or rather 1863, first into Illinois and subsequently into Nebraska. Now, they formed a body of Indians who were parties to several treaties with the Government thereafter, and they were not connected in any way with the Santee Sioux of the treaty-making States of North Dakota and South Dakota. Now, as a matter of fact, there were no Santee Sioux in North Dakota, with the exception possibly of a very few in the southeastern corner.

There were two branches of the Santee Sioux living in South Dakota who have been beneficiaries under legislation of Congress and who have been beneficiaries under a suit brought by them against the Government for annuities which had been confiscated. Now, the Santee Sioux in Nebraska made several treaties with the Government by which the Government was permitted to build railroads, and so forth, through their country, and they received the benefits in return, and here is a provision which gives a sum of money to the Santee Sioux of three States. Now, in the State of Minnesota there are approximately 11,000 members of the Santee Sioux belonging to two sub-branches, and those remaining are the ones who were left there because their hands were clean from the shedding of white blood in the great uprising of 1863, and if there are any Indians belonging to the Santee Sioux in the world who are entitled to consideration from the Government in a gratuity appropriation these are the ones, and they should not be omitted. I desire to make this statement. The gentleman knows there have been before the Indian Affairs Committee and sometimes before the House during many years past quite a number of matters that related to the Santee Sioux and the Santee Sioux have been the subject of a great deal of inquiry by the committee and many facts have been received and are now available. The Santee Sioux in Minnesota, so far as I can determine, have not been beneficiaries under this Government for a great many years as far as any gratuity appropriation is concerned. I, personally, have communicated with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in years past to ascertain why nothing had ever been done to take care of those people. Their condition—nearly every winter at least—is quite deplorable, and I invite the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs particularly to those Indians who are now living in the western and southwestern part of Minnesota and who seem to be outside of any regard the Government has to its Indian wards, and I would like to inquire if it is not possible to make some appropriation here or to change the language of this present paragraph in some particular so that they can participate in the benefits that go to the Santee Sioux generally.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14746 and had come to no resolution thereon.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I present the Agricultural appropriation bill, with a report (No. 980) thereon, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15018) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota reserves all points of order on the bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BROWNING was granted leave of absence for three days on account of important business.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14746, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, this House passed on two or three occasions a bill authorizing the Santee Sioux to bring a suit against the Government to have returned to them their annuities that had been confiscated by the Government in 1863. After a time the House passed it, and the Senate also passed it, and it became a law. As far as I know, that has never yet been adjudicated. I suppose it is in process of adjudication. The beneficiaries under any return that may be made to those Indians from the Government will include all of the Santee Sioux who have not yet received a restoration of their annuities, and of which there are probably four or five thousand, and, as I said, 1,100 living in Minnesota. I want to insist that these 1,100 that remain in Minnesota are either those who did not participate in that insurrection or the descendants of those who did not, and it seems to me that the Government, while it has been proceeding over the country to pick up needy Indians here and there, very properly, and has looked after them, has singularly failed to give any attention at all to these Indians. When their property was confiscated, and these innocent ones had their property confiscated as well as the guilty ones, they were living on perhaps the finest and most fertile part of Minnesota, on each side of the Minnesota, west of Mankato and up to the Dakota line. They lost their land, they lost their annuities that were due them in consideration of the vast tract of land which they had a short time before sold to the Government. And they have been left high and dry ever since. I insist that if the Santee Sioux are to be beneficiaries, and it is possible to extend the privileges that may naturally go to that branch of the Indian tribe to the Minnesota Indians, it ought to be done. And I simply have taken this time to ask of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, or some one else who perhaps is better acquainted with the facts than I am, whether or not the Santee Sioux could not, with due regard to our treaty obligations, be considered in this paragraph to include the Santee Sioux of Minnesota?

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, this item refers to one of the three major agreements or treaties that were made with the Indians of South Dakota. The treaty of April 29, 1868, which was ratified in 1869, established certain specific reservations in eastern South Dakota and specified that all of western South Dakota should remain as Indian reservations. At that time the Santee Tribe was part in South Dakota and part in Nebraska, and that is where the Santee Sioux of Nebraska came into that agreement. The next major agreement with the Indians was in 1877, under which that portion of the reservation in western South Dakota was restricted by the opening of the Black Hills, and to that agreement not only the Five Tribes in western South Dakota but the Cheyennes and the Arapahoes in Wyoming were parties. The third major agreement was in 1889, under which the reservation in western South Dakota was divided between the Five Tribes out there and a part opened to settlement. The Santee Sioux in Minnesota had nothing whatever to do with the agreement of 1868, which simply sought to specify the boundaries of Indian reservations within the State of South Dakota, with the exception that a part of the Santee Sioux that were parties to the agreement were located in Nebraska.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is the gentleman quite certain that those who signed the treaty to which he refers, that of 1868, were representing the Santee Sioux of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Nebraska? Of course, at that time there was no South Dakota or North Dakota.

Mr. GANDY. There was no North Dakota or South Dakota then. And the south boundary of the Indian reservation in South Dakota went quite a way down in what is now the State of Nebraska. The reservation was afterwards restricted to the State line by this agreement of 1877.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it not a fact that those who signed that treaty signed it as the representatives of the Santee Sioux Indians and they did not state the particular branch of the Santee Sioux Indians that they acted for? Is it not proper to say they acted for the Santee Sioux of Minnesota as well as their brothers in the other three States? And is it not possible under that treaty to insert the name "Minnesota" in there, along with North Dakota and South Dakota?

Mr. GANDY. I do not so understand it, for that agreement only pertained to those living in South Dakota and a portion that lived in Nebraska.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That may be the construction the Government has seen fit to place on that treaty. I have not the treaty provisions clearly in mind at this minute, although I have read them many times. I have a general knowledge and recollection of them. And my thought is that the Indians who signed it represented all the bands of the Santee Sioux. In 1868 the Santee Sioux were scattered, broken up, and tribal bands destroyed, and no one party that signed the treaty could perhaps legally say just whom he represented. I may be mistaken, but it seems to me not at all unlikely that those who signed that treaty were representing those of Minnesota as well as those of North Dakota and South Dakota, which States did not then exist.

Mr. GANDY. I want to say to my friend that he can easily understand that I have no personal knowledge of it. I only have at hand the same treaties he has access to, and that is my understanding of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TEXAS.

SEC. 21. For the education of the Alabama and Coushatta Indians located in Polk County, Tex., by aiding the public schools established by the State or local authorities to the extent of 10 cents per day for each Indian child who attends such schools, $2,000.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order to the section.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve it.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I will reserve it for a moment.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order. This is a very small item. I am sure we have done nothing to offend the gentleman. It is something that is needed down there. I think they are entitled to it if any Indians are.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What sort of Indians are they?

Mr. McLEMORE. They are——

Mr. GARNER. Let me say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that this is in the district of my colleague [Mr. GREGG], who has been sick for six weeks and has not been able to attend the sessions of the House. Unless the gentleman has examined it and thinks it ought not to be considered in connection with the bill, I would like to have the gentleman consider the propriety of withdrawing the point of order. If, on the other hand, he thinks it is a bad piece of legislation, then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this inaugurates on the part of the Indian Office the care of Indians that have been taking care of themselves ever since Texas was a part of Mexico.

Mr. GARNER. If the committee thinks it is bad policy, I will not say anything on the point of order. I merely call attention to the fact that this is in the district of Mr. GREGG, who has not been able to attend the sessions of the House for several weeks.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I talked with Mr. GREGG about this a year ago, and he was for it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Arizona on the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Revised Statutes provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall have charge of the supervision of Indians. Section 462 provides that—

There shall be in the Department of the Interior a Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

And section 463 provides that—

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and agreeable to such regulations as the President may prescribe, have the management of all Indian affairs and of all matters arising out of Indian relations.

Then the law provides how the accounts and vouchers shall be paid. It is further provided that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall submit to Congress a statement of all expenditures under his supervision, how much is disbursed for each object, and so on, implying clearly that appropriations might be made for this purpose.

Now, this is an Indian appropriation bill. It is for the support and civilization and education of Indians. We propose to do for these Texas Indians exactly what Congress does for other Indians in other parts of the country. This provision was incorporated in the Indian appropriation act of last year, so it is not a new policy. We are continuing a policy heretofore inaugurated in this Indian bill, and we are making appropriations for other Indians similarly situated, and therefore we ought to be able to make appropriations for these Texas Indians in accordance with the judgment of the House. For these reasons I believe that the point of order should not be sustained.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the very rapid-fire argument of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] would apply if we were talking about Indians, but we are talking about citizens of the State of Texas, who may have some Indian blood in them but who have been exercising the rights of citizens for a hundred years and have been voting as citizens in Polk County, Tex. Last year we gave them a small gratuity. There is no sort of obligation on the part of the Government that we should continue that gratuity.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask a question. The Chair confesses ignorance of Indian matters. The question which the Chair wishes to ask is whether the band of Indians to which this item relates is in the control of the Indian Department?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; they are not and never have been.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course the point of order raises the question of whether this appropriation was authorized by law. There is no law providing that the United States shall educate Indians who are not under the control of the Interior Department, or not under the control of the Government in any way, and not in tribal relations.

The same question arose some years ago as to other items in the Indian appropriation bill. My recollection is that the Chair has invariably sustained a point of order against an item providing for the support of Indians and providing for the education of Indians where they were not in any way whatever under the control of the Government.

It may be said that these are Alabama and Coushatta Indians, yet under the law they are not Indians. They are citizens of the United States. No one will controvert that proposition. They are not living in tribal relations, and have not been living in tribal relations, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, since Texas was admitted into the Union.

Mr. HAYDEN. They retain a tract of land down there, which would indicate that they have communal property among them.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they have communal property among themselves or not, but they are citizens of the United States. There is no obligation that the Government shall provide for the education of an Indian simply because you want to call him an Indian. There are gentlemen in this House who are Indians in one sense, but they are not Indians in that sense that Congress would be authorized to make a provision for their support or education. That is a test right here.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman refers to Indians belonging to the House, I can not agree with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. We do make a provision for the support of the gentleman from Oklahoma, but we do not single him out as distinguished from the rest of us as an Indian. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The fact that an item has been carried in an appropriation bill, unless the item was in order under the rules, does not make it in order in this bill. The fact that it has been carried for any number of years does not remove it from the bar of being out of order if, as a matter of fact, it is new legislation and not authorized by law. The Chair does not believe that it is in order on the annual appropriation bill for the civilization and education of the Indians to legislate by providing for the education of persons who are not Indians nor under the control of the Indian Office. Following that principle, the Chair believes this section obnoxious to the rules of the House and sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, within his discretion, the sum of $350,000 of the principal funds to the credit of the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians and to expend the sum of $50,000 of said amount for the benefit of the Ute Mountain (formerly Navajo Springs) Band of said Indians in Colorado, and the sum of $200,000 of said amount for the Uintah, White River, and Uncompahgre Bands of Ute Indians in Utah, and the sum of $100,000 of said amount for the Southern Ute Indians in Colorado, which sums shall be charged to said bands, and the Secretary of the Interior is also authorized to withdraw from the Treasury the accrued interest to and including June 30, 1919, on the funds of the said Confederated Bands of Ute Indians appropriated under the act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., p. 934), and to expend or distribute the same for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the said Indians, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress, on the first Monday in December, 1920, a detailed statement as to all moneys expended as provided for herein.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving a point of order, I would be glad if the committee would explain something about the method of promoting civilization by the distribution of this $350,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan reserves the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the committee does not care to explain it, I make the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is the gentleman referring to this withdrawal of Ute funds?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am referring to what has just been read by the Clerk on page 52, the distribution of that $350,000 for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians.

Mr. HAYDEN. Instead of appropriating money as a gratuity out of the Treasury for these Indians as we do for other Indians, we appropriate money from their fund. Some years ago the Utes obtained a judgment against the United States in the sum of $3,305,257.19, and they have that fund to their credit in the Treasury of the United States. Following the policy of the committee where Indians have funds to their credit that they should pay their own way, we appropriate this money for the maintenance of their agency, schools, and so forth.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is it customary to use the interest or the principal of such fund?

Mr. HAYDEN. We can use the interest or the principal or both, just as Congress may decide.

Mr. CRAMTON. I was asking as to the custom.

Mr. HAYDEN. In some cases we use the interest only, if the interest will pay all the expenses. If the interest is not enough, we use a part of the principal sum.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am speaking of these particular Indians.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I will say that it has been the policy of the Indian Affairs Committee and of the House to use Indian funds where it was possible to use them for the payment of any expenses on the reservation in connection with the Indians where it could be done without violating the treaty or an agreement with the Indians, and to use the fund, either interest or principal—any funds they might have.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the gentleman has said that these particular Indians had a fund of some $6,000,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. They had at the start.

Mr. CRAMTON. To what extent have we used up that fund?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I was not permitted to be present when the hearings were held, as the gentleman knows. Perhaps the gentleman from Arizona can explain that. He is more familiar with the hearings than I am. I do not know just to what extent these funds have been consumed; but since the judgment was rendered we have been using the fund to just about the same extent as we are using it here, as I recall.

Mr. HAYDEN. Practically the same.

Mr. WELLING. This is the same as last year's item. This item is in exactly the same wording as the item of last year, with the exception of putting in this year's dates instead of last year's dates.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If my memory serves me correctly, prior to the time that this judgment was rendered a portion of this money was appropriated from the Public Treasury; but now that they have the fund on hand, there being no treaty provision to prevent our using it, we have felt justified in using their own fund to pay their own expenses.

Mr. CRAMTON. What is done with the interest on their fund?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is placed to their credit in the Treasury.

Mr. CRAMTON. To their principal?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. To their principal.

Mr. HAYDEN. That principal fund draws 4 per cent. You will find a long justification for this on pages 314 to 318 in the hearings.

Mr. CRAMTON. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing construction and enlargement of the Wapato irrigation and drainage system, to make possible the utilization of the water supply provided by the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L., 604), for 40 acres of each Indian allotment under the Wapato irrigation project on the Yakima Indian Reservation, Wash., and such other water supply as may be available or obtainable for the irrigation of a total of 120,000 acres of allotted Indian lands on said reservation, $500,000 to be immediately available: Provided, That the entire cost of said irrigation and drainage system shall be reimbursed to the United States under the conditions and terms of the act of May 18, 1916: Provided further, That the sum herein appropriated shall be available for the purchase of such lands as may be required in connection with the construction of the aforesaid irrigation project.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I wish to inquire as to the need of authorization for the purchase of additional land in connection with this irrigation project as embodied in the proviso.

Mr. HAYDEN. There was some discussion in the committee about the necessity for purchasing additional land in connection with this project. There were some questions asked by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL], and he seemed to be satisfied that the authority ought to be given for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. But here we are voting a half million dollars, and without limit you are going to authorize them to purchase additional lands. I think the House ought to have some information as to what is really intended under that authorization. I was under the impression that in these irrigation projects on Indian reservations the lands were owned by the Indians, either under allotments to them or else in tribal relations.

Mr. HAYDEN. The original purchase of lands was made off of the reservation, in order to obtain a site for a diversion dam. The water must be diverted from the river at some distance from the reservation and carried down the canal to the land of the Indians. We authorized the purchase of land upon which to construct the diversion dam and it was represented that it was necessary to purchase additional land for a similar purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has no information as to the amount of money required for this purpose?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; but my recollection is that it is a comparatively small amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe the matter can be given consideration in another body, and I make the point of order as to the last proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from Oklahoma say to that?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cancel the patent issued in the name of Davie Skootah, allottee No. 35, on the Lummi Reservation, Wash., and to reallot the lands under the provisions of the general allotment law to unallotted members of the Lummi Tribe in areas of not exceeding 10 acres each.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, my recollection is that this Indian died and left no heirs. They now want the land to revert to the tribe so that it can be allotted to some one else.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman says he had no heirs at all?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is the statement made by the commissioner as I recollect it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the proportionate share of the cost of constructing a diversion dam and for the construction of canals and laterals for the irrigation of Indian land on the ceded portion of the Wind River Reservation, Wyo., $50,000, to be immediately available, reimbursable under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read. Am I mistaken in my impression that this is a new project?

Mr. MONDELL. This is not a new project. It is one that has been under construction by the Indian Office for some time; a part of the time in cooperation with the white settlers, whose lands are partially watered by this canal.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the total amount that has been expended on the project to date?

Mr. MONDELL. The first construction was some years ago on the canal known as the Le Claire Canal. I do not recall the cost. As a matter of fact, I think the canal was paid for out of the general irrigation fund rather than a special item. Year before last a sum was allotted out of the general irrigation fund for additional work on this canal in coopertion with settlers who extended the ditch. It has developed that the somewhat temporary headgate that has served the canal for a considerable length of time needs to be replaced with a permanent one, and this amount is for the Indians' share of the permanent headgate and some additional laterals to water Indian land.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the total amount that is to be imposed on the Indian fund?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 26. That in addition to the Indian tribal and treaty funds, the expenditure of which is specifically authorized elsewhere in this act, and such sums as may be required for equalization of allotments, education of Indian children, per capita and other payments to Indians, and expenditures for the Five Civilized Tribes, in accordance with existing laws, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not exceeding $2,325,000 from funds held by the United States in trust for the respective tribes, for support and civilization of the Indians under the jurisdiction of the following agencies, to wit:

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this section being considered as an entirety or, as is customary in appropriation bills, by paragraphs?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that the first paragraph making appropriation of the entire amount to be expended takes from the fund as provided by the different items throughout the following part of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression that the gentleman's colleague [Mr. FERRIS] was going to make a point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is correct, but I was waiting until the Clerk read the whole section.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was afraid the gentleman would wait too long.

Mr. GARD. It is evident that section 26 is the section which authorizes the total expenditure, and the other is only a matter of detail.

Mr. STAFFORD. For the information of my good friend from Ohio, let me say that in appropriation bills the first section may consist of a hundred or a thousand paragraphs, and each paragraph is considered separately, and if you pass one paragraph you waive the point of order.

Mr. GARD. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that a part of the paragraph just read is the appropriation and the remaining items are the separate paragraphs, and under the rules appropriation bills are considered by paragraphs. It is not for the Chair to pass upon whether the thing is intelligent or not; it is intelligent as far as the rule is concerned. The Chair will hold that we are considering this by paragraphs.

Mr. FERRIS. It seemed to me that a page and a half of the statistical items was a part of the paragraph, but if there is any doubt about it I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not ask unanimous consent to consider the section as an entirety?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the whole section will be considered as one paragraph.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it through.

The Clerk read as follows:

In Arizona: Colorado River, $10,500; Fort Apache, $87,291; Kaibab, $1,780; San Carlos, $145,990; Salt River, $365; Truxton Canyon, $55,000; Western Navajo, $100.
In California: Greenville, $15,310; Pala, $205; Round Valley, $1,340; Tule River, $1,200.
In Colorado: Southern Ute, $19,490; Ute Mountain, $47,100.
In Idaho: Coeur d'Alene, $13,700; Fort Hall, $16,360; Fort Lapwai, $15,000.
In Iowa: Sac and Fox, $1,200.
In Kansas: Pottawatomie, $4,750.
In Louisiana: Chettimanchi, $658.
In Michigan: Mackinac, $2,138.
In Minnesota: Leech Lake, $1,000; Red Lake, $15,000; White Earth, $250.
In Montana: Blackfeet, $51,920; Crow, $301,000; Flathead, $40,000; Fort Belknap, $41,000; Fort Peck, $9,000; Rocky Boy, $21,000; Tongue River, $25,394.
In Nebraska: Omaha, $16,400; Winnebago, $5,423.
In Nevada: Nevada, $3,572; Walker River, $200; Western Shoshone, $21,270.
In New Mexico: Jicarilla, $100,105; Mescalero, $20,000; San Juan, $2,500.
In North Carolina: Eastern Cherokee, $3,500.
In North Dakota: Fort Berthold, $25,000; Standing Rock, $118,242; Turtle Mountain, $250.
In Oklahoma: Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache, $31,900; Cheyenne and Arapahoe, $4,374; Cantonment, $2,000; Seger, $100; Pawnee, $1,500; Ponca, $1,450; Seneca, $500; Sac and Fox, $8,500.
In Oregon: Klamath, $125,000; Siletz, $110; Umatilla, $1,500.
In South Dakota: Cheyenne River, $159,000; Crow Creek, $500; Lower Brule, $5,200; Pine Ridge, $6,000; Sisseton, $10,900; Yankton, $7,828.
In Utah: Uintah, etc., $74,010.
In Washington: Colville, $27,185; Cushman, $700; Spokane, $28,000; Taholah, $4,800; Tulalip, $5,000; Yakima, $72,000.
In Wisconsin: La Pointe, $5,000; Koshena, $390,350.
In Wyoming: Shoshone, $89,090.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the paragraph as being unauthorized, without warrant of law, for the reason that it contains new legislation, and for the further reason that it appropriates two and one-third million dollars without authority of law. Not only that, but it does that in the face of a positive prohibition carried in the Indian appropriation act of May 18, 1916, known as the Dill amendment, which contains a positive proviso as follows:

Provided, That thereafter no money shall be expended from Indian tribal funds without specific appropriation by Congress, except as far as equalization of allotments, education of Indian children in accordance with existing law, per capita and other payments, all of which are hereby continued in full force and effect.

If the Chair will indulge me a moment, I want him to recur to the language in this appropriation, and it will be readily disclosed that the $2,325,000 is in addition to all of these exceptions and in the face of the specific prohibition. Beginning on line 10, page 59, and running to line 21 of the same page, if the Chair will read with me, I think he will discover readily that it is put in for the specific purpose of giving them this additional two and one-third million dollars, and so specifically recites:

SEC. 26. That in addition to the Indian tribal and treaty funds, the expenditure of which is specifically authorized elsewhere in this act, and such sums as may be required for equalization of allotments, education of Indian children, per capita and other payments to Indians, and expenditures for the Five Civilized Tribes, in accordance with existing laws—

The Chair will observe that so far that follows the line of exceptions, and now we have the following:

the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not exceeding $2,325,000 from funds held by the United States in trust for the respective tribes, for support and civilization of the Indians under the jurisdiction of the following agencies, to wit—

Mr. Chairman, the facts are about these: The orderly arrangement of this bill takes up and deals with these items by States, and it was brought to the attention of the Indian Committee that large sums of money were being expended from Indian tribes, and withdrawn and expended without Congress knowing anything about it, or, at least, without it appearing in the Indian appropriation bill in any way. The Indian Committee is to be commended for bringing in the Indian Department and having them specify the sources from which they acquire this money, but I fear the committee has neglected the task of striking at the problem of whether these moneys should be expended at all, and the amendment in the bill of 1916 was intended to positively prohibit the very thing that had been going on. The gentleman in charge of the bill will tell you that they are remnants and fragments of law that permit them to make these expenditures from Indian funds. I do not know whether that is true or not. It may be. I am not in a position to deny it, but what I do say is that no matter what the fragmentary law may be, no matter what authority may have been given to them to expend Indian moneys, certainly the Dill amendment just read prohibited them in the future from expending any more tribal funds without specific appropriation by Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This amendment referred to was in the bill in 1916, was it not?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In spite of that is not the department spending this money?

Mr. FERRIS. They did it last year, because last year the Indian appropriation bill authorized them to spend two and a half million dollars.

Mr. MANN. And are they not doing it now?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman know that now, as a matter of fact, they are actually spending this money at these agencies?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman may be right. I hope they are not spending it without some warrant of law.

Mr. MANN. I assume they are not spending it without some warrant of law; but if they are spending it, as I am informed they are, and their accounts are being audited, does not the gentleman think that there probably is some warrant of law for the expenditure of the money?

Mr. FERRIS. The proof of the pudding is the eating, and when I read a positive, emphatic prohibition against spending it I do not need to go any further to satisfy myself, and I ought not to have to seek further to satisfy the House or the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is putting the matter of construction ahead of the eating of the pudding. The gentleman states that the proof of the pudding is the eating. The eating is going on, and the gentleman says that theoretically there is no pudding, but they are eating it now, and the auditors of the department are holding that the eating is proper.

Mr. FERRIS. If that is true, it is not up to us to again write it into law, unless we know what these funds are for.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield.

Mr. GANDY. I just wanted to inquire if the gentleman understood the Dill amendment prohibited Congress from making this appropriation?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, not at all; but what I do say is the Dill amendment fixes substantive law and this is legislation upon an appropriation bill changing that substantive. It does the thing which the Dill amendment specifically prohibits. It changes the law. It invades the rule against legislating on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman indulge me first? Prior to the enactment of the Dill amendment these funds were being expended under existing law on the order of the Secretary of the Interior, and the Dill amendment only provided that the Secretary of the Interior could not expend the money without first having an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, that is theoretical, as far as the Government is concerned, entirely. No one knew—I have lived in Oklahoma 18 years and I did not know that the Indian Department was expending sixty-odd thousand dollars for running a little agency in my immediate district. The bureau report said they were expending $25,000 and the Indians thought they were expending $25,000 and the Congress thought they were expending $25,000, but this amendment developed that they are spending about $58,000 to $60,000. My thought is that there is no justification in law for all these items; there is not a line of justification in the hearings—and I have looked them over very carefully and am looking them over now—there is not a line of justification for this long list of 69 agencies scattered through 22 States. I do not see how we can appropriate without warrant of law. I do not see how we can appropriate in the face of the law. We have no justification; of course, there may be a justification that has not been presented. What I do say is there is no justification here before us.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. All that the gentleman says may be true about the law. There may not be any justification for it, but we did appropriate last year two and a half million dollars.

Mr. FERRIS. I know.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. And all in the world that we have attempted to do here is to get the department to give a reasonable basis of authority for proposing to expend this two and a half millions for this year.

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely; but I will state——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We thought we were doing you a good turn to show the House that there was a certain amount of money being expended in each one of these activities that you did not know anything about.

Mr. FERRIS. The committee does not need any commendation, because it stands high in this House, but if it is worth anything I would gladly commend them, but what I do say is that I do not think the committee ought to turn over a lump sum of two and a quarter millions without enabling the House to find out. This surely is not too much.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have just read the proviso of the law of 1916, and it seems to me that it does not leave very much for the gentleman of Oklahoma to hang his point of order on.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It provides that no money shall be used for the Indian Office hereafter without specific appropriation by Congress. We are making specific appropriation here in this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, precisely; but that is a prohibition and not an authorization.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; but it is being appropriated by the Congress. The amendment prohibits them from using it without being appropriated by Congress.

Mr. FERRIS. Congress, of course, can give or deny as it likes. That is not the question here at issue.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But we are giving it now in this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. The question is whether you are doing it under the rules of the House or not. I think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes, we are. We are authorizing the appropriation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention just a little further to the proposition as indicated by the gentleman from Kansas. The statute prohibits an appropriation out of these funds except in a certain specific way.

It provides for per capita payment of money to the Indians for salary in compensation of officials and employees, and compensation for counsel and attorneys for the support and civilization of the Indians, provided that thereafter no money shall be expended from Indian tribal funds without specific appropriations by Congress, which, of course, will permit general appropriations for those items which fall under the exceptions. But the prohibition is not against appropriating at all; but the prohibition is against appropriating except in a specific manner, which is that the appropriations shall not be general but shall be specific.

Now, as I understand the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], according to his construction, it would be impossible for this Indian appropriation committee to write into their bill an appropriation which would not be subject to a point of order, because he contends that even when we come within the proviso and specifically appropriate it is subject to a point of order, and the law itself says they shall not appropriate in any other way.

Mr. FERRIS. I know the gentleman does not intend to misstate the facts. The gentleman's argument of the law is correct, but he is not reading the section correctly. This $2,500,000 is in addition to the appropriation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not mistaken.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman misunderstands the gentleman from Mississippi, then, because I understand his line of argument——

Mr. VENABLE. What is your point?

Mr. FERRIS. My point is that section 26, from lines 10 to 21, which is the forerunner of all these 69 items, that this money is in addition to the things specifically mentioned and a fair construction of the powers of the committee. It says—

In addition to the Indian tribal and treaty funds, the expenditure of which is specifically authorized elsewhere in this act, and such sums as may be required for equalization of allotments, education of Indian children per capita, and other payments to Indians, and expenditures for the Five Civilized Tribes, in accordance with existing laws, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend not exceeding $2,325,000.

And among tribes numbering 69, and in 22 States, all in a wad. Who can say there is warrant of law for any such an item as that?

Mr. VENABLE. If the gentleman please, there is no prohibition in this law on making appropriations in any way, as I read it, except in certain specified manner. There is no prohibition here, as I understand it, that they shall not make appropriation in addition to these things which are enumerated. The only limitation is upon the manner in which the appropriation shall be made, and in a certain class of appropriations those must be specified in order to follow the construction of the statute. I think that is the only limitation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The difficulty with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] is that he confuses the exceptions which are made in this bill as to standing appropriations with the exceptions that are made as to appropriations that may be made annually by Congress, as is being discussed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE]. Now, what does this say? It says that thereafter no money shall be expended from tribal funds without specific appropriation by Congress. Then the exception follows of the equalization of allotment, education of Indian children, and so forth. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] calls attention to the fact that we except those very things in our language here. The gentleman from Mississippi is directing his argument to the contention that by implication this language:

Thereafter no money shall be expended from Indian tribal funds without specific appropriation by Congress.

That language alone, by implication, gives authority to Congress to make appropriations annually and specifically, as we have done in this bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us take the history of this transaction and I think we can clear the matter up just a little bit. What do we find? When we came to the Sixty-fourth Congress, I think it is, we found, as I have repeated here several times on the floor of the House, that the Secretary of the Interior had been expending some $2,500,000 or more every year on a standing appropriation made by old treaties, old laws that were out of date, and perhaps did not call for the expenditure required at that time, and that Congress had no knowledge whatever of the amount of money that was being expended. So the first thing we did was to put in this provision. My friend from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has those authorizations for the expenditure of those sums, and he will read them in a few moments to the Chair. So then the first thing we did was to require the Secretary of the Interior to bring before Congress certain information by which we might make the appropriations. Until that time we said what? We said—

Provided, That thereafter no money shall be expended from Indian tribal funds without specific appropriation by Congress—

And then the exceptions followed.

Mr. Chairman, if the previous acts of Congress authorized the expenditure of these funds, then this is an implication as clear and explicit as can be made, in my opinion.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman was right in his contention about this carrying an implication that they can in the future appropriate from tribal funds, any amount can be brought in on a bill here and take every cent of money out of the tribal funds of every one of the 69 tribes of the United States, and it would not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I am willing to leave that to the good judgment of this House at any time.

Mr. FERRIS. That is not the question. Does the gentleman contend that this is written into the law and that that so-called Dill amendment gives him authority to appropriate all the money out of the treasury of every tribe of Indians in the United States and it would still not be subject to a point of order?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that wherever any appropriation was authorized by law prior to the time we passed the Dill amendment—and that was the understanding of the committee at the time—any amendment that had been authorized by a standing law prior to that time can, under the language of this measure, be appropriated for, and I do not think there is any argument on the other side of that question.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman mind presenting to the Chair the authority of law for the use of the funds of any one of the 69 tribes?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] presented the authority before this amendment came along, and now the amendment itself is the authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the Forty-seventh Congress, by the act approved March 3, 1883 (22 Stats, p. 590), it was provided, among other things, that the proceeds arising from pasturage, the sale of timber and from coal fields and oil fields, and so forth, on Indian reservations, except those of the Civilized Tribes, not the result of any labor on the part of members of the tribes, should be covered into the Treasury of the United States under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior might prescribe, and that he should report thereon to Congress. Then in the Forty-ninth Congress, by the act of March 2, 1887 (24 Stats., p. 463), it was provided that the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to use the money that had been or hereafter might be covered into the Treasury of the United States under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, which was carried on the books under the caption of "Indian money," for the benefit of the several tribes on whose account the money was covered in, in such manner and for such objects as he might deem best, and that thereafter annually he should report thereon to Congress. In accordance with this authority of law these Indian funds were placed in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians, and the Secretary of the Interior had authority to spend the same for their benefit. The Committee on Indian Affairs discovered, in going through the reports of the Secretary of the Interior, that the income of the various tribes aggregated about $3,000,000 a year, and that he was expending this money year after year, making reports of the expenditures to Congress in his annual reports. The purpose of the Dill amendment was not to prohibit his expenditure of that money, as theretofore, for the support and civilization and benefit of the Indians, but to provide that the Secretary of the Interior could not use these tribal funds without specific authority from Congress.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. The Dill amendment was not an annual amendment. It was written in the substantive law.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. So that if we did require them to come to Congress annually thereafter for authority to use the tribal funds, how can you come in and put on a rider of this kind overriding the Dill law?

Mr. HAYDEN. This provision merely carries out the intent of the Dill amendment. It says that these Indian funds which the Secretary of the Interior has heretofore been spending as he thought fit "are hereby to be expended in the following manner."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair would like to have the pamphlet containing the Dill amendment.

The bill before the committee is a bill making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Bureau and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, and for other purposes. Under the law read by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Secretary of the Interior has the right to use certain funds of the various Indian tribes in the Treasury Department for the benefit of the Indian tribes. I am not going into details, but speaking generally he has authority to use such trust funds for their civilization, allotment, education, and so forth. In the opinion of the Chair, prior to the passage of the so-called Dill amendment, the Secretary of the Interior had the right to use Indian funds for that purpose. The question now arises whether the Dill amendment made it unlawful for the Secretary of the Interior to so use that money, or whether the Dill law makes the section of the bill before the committee, making an appropriation out of the tribal funds in addition to the appropriations carried in the other parts of the bill, in order on this bill under the rules of the House. The Dill amendment provided that—

Hereafter no money shall be expended from Indian tribal funds without appropriation by Congress, except as follows.

Now, in the opinion of the Chair that amendment prohibited the Secretary of the Interior from using these tribal funds for the purposes enumerated in the section unless there was a specific authorization by Congress for him to do so. The Chair believes he had the right to use those funds before the Dill amendment was passed. The Chair is of opinion that the Dill amendment required that there should be specific authority from Congress to use them, and the Chair believes that as these appropriations were previously in order under the general law it is in order to offer as an amendment or to bring in as a part of this bill a specific authorization appropriating for those purposes which the Secretary had authority under general law to use prior to the passage of the Dill amendment. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. This will not be agreed to; I know that. I mean the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, what I want to say is that this is a very bad way in which to handle Indian money. Here is the Indian appropriation bill, made up from time immemorial of items classified by States and made up in alphabetical order, beginning with Arizona and winding up with Wyoming, so that any Member of the House or any member of the committee could take up the bill in the regular way, and at least think he was finding out what was being appropriated and what was being done.

Now, after we have gone through this bill in an orderly way and proceeded regularly with the items, and dealt with them State by State and tribe by tribe, this section 26 is added for the first time. This section allows the department to go into the funds of 69 tribes of Indians in the United States and take from their funds certain moneys, some as high as $150,000 in amount, and expend them.

This provision authorized them to go into 22 States where Indians live and take money out of the tribal funds, and go ahead and expend it. I do not think that is the way to handle public funds. I do not think it is a safe or prudent way to handle public funds. I do not think it will beget the best results. I am sure the Indians will be dissatisfied with it. I know some of them are now dissatisfied with it, and it ought not to go on. The committee have accomplished some good things by bringing out just where the department is getting this money. I commend them for that. I am told that next year they have asked the Indian Department to assemble and draw together these items and put them in their regular places in the bill. I commend them for that. But when I look at the hearings here I find them as silent as the grave, not a word of justification for this large sum of money. It seems to me that we are playing a little fast and loose on this proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much money is involved?

Mr. FERRIS. It is $2,325,000, and it comes out of 69 tribal funds of 69 different tribes, going over 22 States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the gentleman say there was no testimony at the hearings?

Mr. FERRIS. There is no testimony in the printed hearings. I am not a member of the committee. I do not criticize anybody for it. This expenditure of public money in lump sums is probably a long-drawn-out custom, pursuant to the law that the gentleman from Arizona read, where the Indian Office has been going in and helping itself to the Indians' money and spending what they thought they should and leaving for the Indians what they might, and the committee may be tapering that thing off as fast as they can; but to me it seems that when we find anything as radically wrong as that appears to be, instead of dealing with the form or the procedure we ought to deal with the substance and tap the matter on the head.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I notice in the item for Montana, under the Crow item, the sum to be appropriated hereby is $301,000. That is a very large sum of money. Has the gentleman any idea as to what the department does with that enormous sum?

Mr. FERRIS. I have not the slightest idea. The hearings do not tell us a word. I do not know a member of the committee who can tell us a word as to what becomes of that money. I notice an appropriation of $31,900 for the little Kiowa Agency in my district. I do not know where it is to be spent. It may be spent for a good purpose, but we should have something in the hearings to disclose just what is being done.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then let me ask the gentleman, under the item of New Mexico, where the language is "Jicarilla, $101,105," can the gentleman inform the committee what the $5 may be for?

Mr. FERRIS. I have not the slightest notion.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman made the statement a moment ago that there was nothing in the hearings with regard to this $2,325,000.

Mr. FERRIS. I could not find anything.

Mr. SNYDER. There is nothing in the hearings with regard to these individual items, but there are about 30 pages in the hearings with regard to the $2,325,000, and the department has promised us a report on each one of these items, which is now being printed, and we were supposed to have a printed report on each of these items here to-day, but it has not come.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then, under "Wisconsin," I notice an item, "Koshena, $390,350." I have lived all my life in the State next to Wisconsin. I have visited, I think, all sections of it. If there are any Indians named Koshena, I do not know who they are. I suppose there are some, but what on earth is the department to spend $390,350 for?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the many years that the gentleman served on the Committee on Indian Affairs he must have learned that one of the largest and most populous Indian reservations was the Menominee Reservation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the headquarters of Menominee Reservation are at Koshena.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is just the point I wanted to develop. This does not a say a word about the Menominee Indians, nor does it say a thing that would invite anybody's attention to the Menominee Indians. Why is the word "Koshena" used?

Mr. STAFFORD. Persons acquainted with Indian affairs would understand that Koshena was the headquarters of the Menominee Indians.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Koshena is not the headquarters of the Menominee Indians, and the gentleman knows that better than I do. It is a spot there——

Mr. STAFFORD. That is where the agency is located; that is, the agency of the Menominee Indian Reservation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am willing to concede that there is an agency there.

Mr. FERRIS. What are they doing with the $390,000?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not a member of the committee. This is a thousand miles from the city of Milwaukee. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. That hereafter all Indians and other persons residing on Indian reservations or superintendencies shall be subject to the State and Territorial marriage, health, and educational laws, and all Indian and other persons upon such reservations or superintendencies, whether resident or not, shall be subject to the State and Territorial criminal laws: Provided, That this act shall not limit or alter the established treaty rights of any Indian tribe or individual Indian in respect to hunting and fishing privileges.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. As this is a part and parcel of the section, I think it would be well to have the whole section read.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Let us have the whole section read.

Mr. MANN. This may be a little different from the rest of the paragraphs.

Mr. STAFFORD. I made that suggestion because the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY], who has taken considerable interest in this matter, has a substitute amendment covering these respective paragraphs. From my investigation of the subject I can see where there is some need of having legislation to protect the Indians on the reservation where at the present time there is no law applicable.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not offer his substitute amendment until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is true; but as this is important I think some explanation should be made before the point of order is withdrawn or insisted upon.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask in reference to this and the succeeding item. As far as I know myself, there is no objection to making the Indians subject to the State and Territorial laws. There is no Territory where there are Indians, is there?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Alaska.

Mr. MANN. Are there Indians in Alaska?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I thought they were Esquimaux. I am not sure but that they ought to be made subject to the laws of health and education, but here you propose to go on and give concurrent jurisdiction to the Federal court to enforce the State law. You go so far as to provide that the Federal district attorney shall prosecute in the State courts against violations of the State law, which we have not the power to do.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GANDY. The thing that we are trying to accomplish by this section can best be understood by a concrete example. In the district I have the honor to represent in this House——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not care about the concrete example. I am talking about the language in the bill. I have no doubt that we would agree on the desirability of some legislation based on the concrete example. But here are provisions where you require the Federal district attorney, in violation of the laws of the State, to prosecute the Indian offenders in the State courts, which the State has not given him the right to do; then you provide that the agent of the Indians shall be a police magistrate of the State, which we have not the power to do.

Mr. GANDY. If the gentleman will bear with me, perhaps the language in this section is not the best, and, in conference with other members of the committee and with attorneys in the Department of Justice, I have prepared a substitute for the section in which the concurrent jurisdiction proposed is entirely eliminated. Jurisdiction is given solely to the United States courts to punish infractions of these laws, and the procedure followed is identical with the procedure and the language is practically the language of the statute in the early days which made the Arkansas criminal law applicable to the Indian Territory and also in eastern Oklahoma.

Mr. CRAMTON. The language here goes further than that stated by the gentleman from Illinois. We attempt to create, perhaps in conflict with the State constitutions, justices of the peace who would try offenses including those not committed by the Indians.

Mr. MANN. This is an attempt to confer on the agents the powers of a justice of the peace in the States, which we have no jurisdiction over at all.

Mr. CRAMTON. The constitution of the State of Michigan fixes the number of the justices of the peace there shall be, and under this, if there happens to be an Indian agency, we are going to try to go in there and let the district attorney create some more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, my impression is that the subject is of such importance that we should not legislate in this way on an appropriation bill. I have given the matter some consideration. I think there is pressing need for legislation, but it is virtually admitted that this legislation carried in this bill has not been as well considered as it should be. I think some committees like the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Indian Affairs should take the question up and present a separate bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman does not think that any power could be reposed in the United States district courts to appoint justices of the peace in the State of Wisconsin, does he?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, what is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. That it is legislation and not in order on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to say a few words in this connection. The gentleman suggests that it is legislation. I suppose it is, but I am not convinced myself that it is open to the objection the gentlemen are leveling to it. I may be mistaken and am seeking information. As I understand it, this is authority to make the superintendent of a reservation a justice of the peace on the reservation to enforce the statute we are enacting here, which happens to repeat some local statute.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. LITTLE. I am asking the gentleman from Wisconsin for the information, not the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must understand that there is nothing before the committee when the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. I was just asking unanimous consent to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, I think we ought to get ahead with this. This is now out of the bill. I do not object to the gentleman's asking a question.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman can ask his question on the next item if he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not mind two minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. That is enough.

The CHAIRMAN. For two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is all right, but would the gentleman tell me what is the objection to legislation to authorize the superintendent of an Indian reservation to be a justice of the peace on that reservation to enforce a statute which we are making here which is simply a repetition of the State statute? We are not interfering with the State by exercising authority on an Indian reservation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has pointed out that we have no authority to create a justice of the peace.

Mr. LITTLE. Congress can create any court that it sees fit.

Mr. STAFFORD. To have jurisdiction over offenses of Indians living on or off the reservation?

Mr. LITTLE. Why not on a reservation? Why can you not take care of them?

Mr. MANN. This would authorize an Indian agent to commit a white man in any State for a violation of a State law.

Mr. LITTLE. After we have enacted this statute it is no longer only a State law and becomes a Federal law; and suppose you do go over on an Indian reservation——

Mr. MANN. The Federal court has no jurisdiction over an ordinary crime committed in the State. We have no authority.

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, yes; of course. But this Government can make any criminal statute that it wants to.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it can not, unless it is authorized by the Constitution.

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly the Constitution authorizes it to say what a crime is, and we can repeat some crime the State of Wisconsin has.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will study the paragraph closely he will see that it is not limited to Indians, but includes any person.

Mr. LITTLE. If you go on a reservation you are liable to the laws in force there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That concurrent jurisdiction is hereby given to the Federal courts to administer the said marriage, health, educational, and criminal laws, and the Federal district attorney shall be charged with the prosecution of offenders against such laws.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the United States district courts in their respective districts are hereby authorized to commission the superintendents of Indian reservations and other officers of the Indian Service on such reservations or superintendencies to act as justices of the peace and committing magistrates with the same jurisdiction, powers, and responsibilities relating to the offenses against the laws mentioned in the first paragraph of this section as are conferred upon the local justices of the peace and committing magistrates by the laws of the States or Territories in which the superintendents are located.

Mr. DYER and Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is legislation.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Idaho desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. FRENCH. Not the point of order; but I would like, if these gentlemen would withhold the point of order or reserve it——

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. GARD. It will be entirely inoperative, anyhow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order that it is legislation not in order on an appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 28. That until the first Monday in December, 1919, those members of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, not less than five in number, who are members elect to the Sixty-sixth Congress, are authorized to conduct hearings and investigate the conduct of the Indian Service, at Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated for expenses incident thereto. The said committee is hereby authorized and empowered to examine into the conduct and management of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and all its branches and agencies, their organization and administration, to examine all books, documents, and papers in the said Bureau of Indian Affairs, its branches or agencies, relating to the administration of the business of said bureau, and shall have and is hereby granted authority to subpœna witnesses, compel their attendance, administer oaths, and to demand any and all books, documents, and papers of whatever nature relating to the affairs of Indians as conducted by said bureau, its branches, and agencies. Said committee is hereby authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance, including stenographers, as said committee may deem necessary in the proper prosecution of its work: Provided, That stenographers so employed shall not receive for their services exceeding $1 per printed page.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph that it is legislation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. No; let us go ahead.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We might persuade the gentleman not to make his point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to be courteous to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan make the point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will reserve it as a courtesy to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state if he intends to make it?

Mr. CRAMTON. I intend to make it.

Mr. DYER. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. What is the point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. That it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. There are certain paragraphs passed over to which we will now recur.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to return to page 16 and offer an amendment to the paragraph beginning in line 13 of that page, although I do not think this was reserved.

Mr. HAYDEN. On page 15 of the bill, I think it was, we passed over an item.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can not we dispose of the one on page 16 first, because I have to ask unanimous consent to return to that?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's request?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent to return to paragraph on page 16, beginning line 13, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to page 16 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman have any objection to informing the committee what his amendment is?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; I shall be glad to do so. I should like to add at the end of the paragraph the words "or to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota." The purpose there is to include the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota from the operation of that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend page 17 by inserting after the word "Indians," in line 2, the words "or to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota: Page 17, line 2, after the word "Indians," insert the words "or to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota."

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I can state in just a word the reason for this. When my attention was called to the language of the laragraph, which, of course, is new legislation, I saw at once, as did my colleagues from Minnesota, that this language completely violated the treaty between the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota and the United States Government. That treaty, which was made in 1889, provides that the funds belonging to those Indians in the hands of the United States Government shall be distributed among the Chippewas of Minnesota who are alive and on the roll 50 years from the time when the last Indian shall have been allotted, and this, of course, is in direct violation of that statute.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to return to page 26, line 9, which was passed over.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let us clean up the other amendments first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this is one of the provisions which was passed over. The Clerk will report the first provision passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

For initial payment for goods and supplies purchased for the Indian Service, $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available and to be reimbursed, by transfer through accounts of disbursing officers or otherwise, from appropriations and funds which are applicable for the various agencies, schools, and projects to which the goods and supplies are subsequently distributed: Provided, That the sums so reimbursed may be reexpended under the same conditions in payment for other purchases made during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] desire to be heard?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will report the next provision which was passed over.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the authorities of Kansas City, Kans., the sum of $1,000 in consideration of the agreement of said authorities forever to maintain and care for the Huron Cemetery, a tract of land in the city of Kansas City, Kans., owned by the Government of the United States, the use of which was conveyed by treaty to the Wyandotte Tribe of Indians as a cemetery for members of said tribe, such payment to be made from the $10,000 appropriated for the preservation and improvement of said cemetery by the act of September 8, 1916 (39 Stat. L., p. 844).

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 9, after the words "United States," by inserting:

As provided in a contract for said purposes with the said city of Kansas City, Kans.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 26, line 9, after "United States," insert: "As provided in a contract for said purposes with the said city of Kansas City, Kans."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I took that matter up with Mr. Meritt, and he asked that those words be inserted. They have a contract, and he thought that this would be better inasmuch as it simplified the contract.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next provision.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, at his discretion, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the principal sum on deposit to the credit of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, arising under section 7 of the act of January 14, 1889, entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," and to use the same for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the said Indians in manner and for purposes provided for in said act.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELLSWORTH: Page 28, lines 1 to 11, strike out the paragraph.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this item now included in the bill at $100,000 is an item which has been changed in the last four or five years in nearly every Congress, being in some Congresses entirely stricken out in the House and afterwards included in another body, and coming back, and finally there being an amount in the bill. It is an item which has been contested since the time the first appropriation was made under the treaty of 1889, whereby the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, at that time some 11,000 or 12,000 in number, ceded to the United States some nine or ten millions of acres of land, with provision for the disposition of land and of the timber upon the land in order to create a fund in trust for the tribe, to be paid out per capita and otherwise under certain specified conditions. I want first to refer to this proposition, that from 1854 to 1874, 20 years—and I spoke of this in the House yesterday in general debate—the tribe of Chippewa Indians, or the Red Lake Band, used to go to Fon du Lac, at the head of Lake Superior, every year to receive an annuity of $1, a condition of famine generally existing before they got that dollar.

In 1874 the annuity system was discontinued, and from that time until 1889, the time that the Government again took under its wing this band of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, and made the treaty of 1889, under which the Indians ceded the lands and the Government agreed to do certain things and to hold their property in trust for the Indians—until that time, for 15 years, the Indians of Minnesota, without any promise or reward or hope of payment to be doled out by the Government, became practically self-supporting, and intermingled with the people in the towns and villages in which they lived, and went on the even tenor of their way. Then the Government took them up again and made the treaty. And I want to take time enough to distinguish between the different kinds of Indian Tribes to show the differences in the conditions affecting these tribes, where they have tribal funds in the Treasury, and other tribes where there are no funds in the Treasury and where the Government pays out a gratuity. The amount on credit now from lands sold or timber sold on lands belonging to the Chippewas, under the Treasury with the United States, is some $6,000,000. The interest, according to the treaty provision, is 5 per cent. The treaty of 1889 provided that the interest should be paid to the Indians, three-fourths of the sum in per capita payments and one-fourth of the sum to be used exclusively for school purposes.

The interest now is about $300,000, or two hundred and ninety-odd thousand dollars. The one-fourth of that is about $75,000, specifically provided for the use of the schools. There were certain provisions in the treaty which provided that when the act was passed by Congress it should not become a law until after it had been submitted to the band of Chippewa Indians, to their general council, and had been approved and accepted by them.

Under the treaty arrangements it was accepted, but upon this statement, that before the Chippewa Indians were willing to adopt the provisions of the treaty of 1889, it was to be understood that none of the principal was to be used except for certain purposes. It was understood by the Indians, and the Supreme Court of the United States in several decisions has held in this and many other Indian cases that the understanding of the Indians at the time of the signing of the treaty would control, and it has controlled in the courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. The portion of the principal could only be used for the following purposes, and the first bill introduced, carrying an appropriation under the provisions of this treaty, contained the following language—I will not read it in detail, but will give the substance of it—for the purpose of "erecting houses, sawmills, and flour mills," for the purchase of "agricultural implements, stock, and seed," for "breaking and fencing land," for "expenses of the delegation of the Chippewa Indians to visit the White Earth Reservation," for the "erection and maintenance and aid of industrial schools, subsistence, and pay of employees, $100,000"; for "surveys, appraisals, removals, and allotments, $100,000,' and other provisions.

Those provisions were first carried in the bill commencing July 1, 1892, and carried down to and including April 4, 1910, a period of 18 years. Under the provisions of the law that country was settled up at that time by the whites and Indians alike, the Indians taking their places and securing their allotments. I think the last allotment was made in 1902, and the rolls were closed at that time, or had been closed for two years in 1900. The last house under this provision was built in 1898, until finally this condition applies: The Indian reservations country belonging to the Red Lake, the White Lake—six reservations in all, tribal reservations—are such to-day that when you drive about the reservation country you could not tell when you got onto a reservation or when you got off. It is simply a typical farming country in that section of Minnesota. You find the Indians in the stores, you find them working as laborers, you find them working in the machine shops in those sections where they have railroad centers, and you find them working in banks and in various places as professional men, practicing law, and teaching school, and whatnot. The conditions are just exactly like the conditions in any other part of the State of Minnesota. The public-school facilities are afforded to the Indian pupils with just the same equal freedom and with the same opportunity for securing an education as they are afforded in any other part of the State of Minnesota to white pupils or may be taken advantage of. Minnesota's school fund is very liberal.

This went on until the act of April 4, 1906, and that was the last time in which the act was passed in this form, providing for building homes, and so forth.

Now, then, keep in mind the fact that there are two separate and distinct funds, one of $75,000, the one-fourth of the interest specified in the treaty, to be used exclusively for school purposes, and the other of $225,000, the three-fourths, which is paid out in annual per capita payments. One-fourth is to be expended exclusively for school purposes, the fund of $75,000.

The fund in question is a part of the principal which the Indian Bureau sought to use, and did use, under the provisions of this present bill for the purposes that I have recited here—for building and maintaining and erecting industrial schools, for the purchase of implements, the purchase of stock, the breaking and fencing of land, the building of sawmills and flour mills—was used in that way until 1910, although the purposes for which this money could be used had practically ceased to exist years before. But since that time the Indian Bureau, always anxious to reach out and hold on to every person who had any quantum of Indian blood in him—one-sixteenth, one-thirty-second, one-sixty-fourth, or one-twenty-eighth, if you please—seeking, therefore, to keep control of the funds of the Indians as a leading string, has secured the passage of an act from year to year "for civilization and self-support and pay of employees of the Indian Service," the only other similar case being that of the Comanches, Kiowas, and Apaches in Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. If I am mistaken about it, then the gentleman's colleague from Oklahoma was mistaken when he answered my question on the section back here, when he said that the fund of the Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches was given to them in per capita payments. And when I asked him if the interest was also paid to them in the same way, he said he thought it was.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if I can make some arrangement about the debate. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I should like about 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH] asks that he be permitted to address the committee for 10 minutes——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If the Chair will indulge me just a moment, let me see if I can not find out first if there is anyone else on that side who desires to speak on this.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I inquire of the gentleman if the committee is going to resist the motion of my colleague?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; the committee feel obliged to do that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am very sorry for that, because if that is the case I shall feel called upon to address the committee.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We shall be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say to the gentleman that it will be a perfunctory opposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I do not know about that. We will do the best we can.

Mr. SNYDER. It is fair to say that the committee held a very exhaustive hearing on this proposition, and the committee feels that it should stand by the appropriation that it has offered in this bill, in view of that investigation. And while I do not care to go into a lengthy discussion of it and am willing to listen to my colleague from Minnesota, yet there are conditions here that seem to me to be vital. It would be quite fatal, in my judgment, to take out this whole appropriation at this time. I think it was fully demonstrated before the committee in the hearings that some of these activities could be done away with, and that much less intensive supervision could be exercised; but it would be fatal, in my judgment, to discontinue it all at once. Therefore I was willing to reduce the appropriation from $160,000 to $100,000.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. For that reason the gentleman may require some time when we come to the discussion of it. I wanted to find out how much time the gentleman wants.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I should like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. How much time does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] desire?

Mr. KNUTSON. I should like to have five minutes now.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. How much time does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] desire?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I should like 10 minutes, but I will shave that a little, if the committee is in a hurry.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I would be very glad if the gentleman would shave it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman intend to sit until the bill is finished to-night?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Yes; we expect to sit until we finish the bill.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In a moment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I sincerely trust that the committee will reconsider its determination with reference to this. I do not want to make anything like a protracted fight, but the gentleman knows this has been going on for two years now.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Let us not discuss the merits of it now. Let us see if we can fix some time for the debate. Then I will be glad to discuss it with the gentleman, although I feel impelled to insist——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask for 10 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, that is too much.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I think the matter ought to be disposed of now, and the gentleman from Oklahoma ought to be willing to allow a few minutes for discussion.

Mr. SNYDER. So far we want 26 minutes on this side.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Suppose we make it 25 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am willing to shave off one minute.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will take 10 minutes on this side. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section be closed in 35 minutes, 25 minutes to be controlled by some gentleman on that side of the House who is for the amendment and 10 minutes to be controlled by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the Chair to control the time? The Chair would prefer that some one else controls the time, because he does not know to whom the time is to be allotted.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. My request was that some gentleman on that side, say the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. ELLSWORTH, shall control 25 minutes, and I control 10 minutes.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I am afraid that I should be tempted to use the whole 25 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not ask unanimous consent that the time be divided, and that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH] have 10 minutes, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] 9 minutes, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the request. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto shall close in 35 minutes, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] to control 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH] to have 10 minutes, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to have 9 minutes, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] to have 1 minute, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] to have 5 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to go right to the meat of the subject in the short time I have. I say, if the money taken from the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, or any part of the money sought to be appropriated in this item, goes into the civilizing channels which the treaty signed in 1889 contemplated, to the Chippewa Indians who were instrumental in making the treaty, and where they felt at that time it should go, then not $100,000 but the amount which the bureau claims, $175,000, would be just as conscientious and a more consistent action to take, and if it does not go into that channel then it seems to me that not a single cent could be appropriated.

If an individual or a bank had a trust fund and there was provided interest and also principal—$75,000 in interest to be first applied to a specific purpose—it would not be considered a sufficient accounting when the trustee came into court and stated that he had spent a part of the principal amount for the certain purpose, but made no accounting for the interest expenditure. Seventy-five thousand dollars was a special fund to be paid for school purposes. The bureau has never made an accounting for the $75,000 having been spent for this purpose or any purpose, but simply comes in and gives a long list of figures, in which is set out the items for salary and expenses, and so forth, amounting to some $183,000, all of which, or practically all of which, is included in expenses of agents, inspectors, superintendents of reservations, engineers, assistant engineers, disciplinarians, matrons, and persons in the Government employ—men who have represented the Government side of the deal. The members of all other tribes have received the services as gratuities, with a few exceptions of small amounts, but in the case of the Chippewa Indians the bureau expects to take the money out of the tribal fund, with the statement that they pay it for schools, when they have absolutely at no time—and I say it without fear of contradiction—they absolutely at no time have made any accounting of the $75,000 to be paid for schools.

Let us see. If you will take pages 408 and 409 of the hearings you will find the only accounting there is which will throw any light on it. Take the column for schools and agency expenses and you will find about $103,000 for agencies and about $62,000 for schools. And, I say, if you throw a man into involuntary bankruptcy and the referee calls him before him to make an accounting, and he refused to make a statement of his receipts and disbursements, in your own accounting as trustee you would have to take the figures you have in hand. That is what we must do now; and from all the figures that we can get anything from—appropriation bills, reports of the bureau, and every hearing from 1889 down to this day—there is nothing to show anything——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. No; I can not yield. There is nothing to show anything except the bare statement by Mr. Meritt, the Assistant Indian Commissioner. And this is what Mr. Meritt says, after 30 pages were consumed in trying to get him to say what, if any, of this $160,000 which is now in the bill at $100,000, because the committee could not conscientiously leave it at $160,000——

Mr. Meritt says in reply to a question by Mr. HASTINGS of how much of this was spent for schools:

> We are maintaining a number of agencies in the Chippewa country, among which is the White Earth. Under each one of those superintendencies there is a system of schools—

Under the superintendents, like schools under a school board in a county or little village supervised by an agent—that is, he is over it in authority.

> there is a system of schools, and we maintain that agency organization out of this appropriation of $160,000 that we are now requesting—

Maintain the schools? Oh, no; they maintain the agency organization. That is all Mr. Meritt would say. He continues:

> and with that appropriation wiped off the statute books we would be absolutely powerless to continue that organization in the Chippewa country, and the Chippewa Indians themselves would be the first people who would suffer as the result of the discontinuance of this appropriation.

Powerless to continue the schools? No; the organization.

I wish I had a little more time, but all I can say is this: The Chippewa Indians, of which there are two factions—and they do not agree on many other things—want this item stricken from the bill. Mr. Meritt suggested that Mr. Coffey, representing a contesting faction on which the bureau has relied for support might have something to say following the statements of Mr. Carl and Mr. Beaulieu, of the regular legislative committee of the general council who, with Mr. Fairbanks and others, ask for the elimination of this provision, and Mr. Hastings, of the committee, inquired:

> The main thing that I want to know is just what I asked you.

He had asked him whether they wanted it appropriated. Mr. Coffey replied:

> Well, it is the sentiment of the Indians that Congress ought not to appropriate this money.

These men do not want Congress to appropriate this money. They have been here every year for 10 years fighting it, and every man, white and red, outside of bureau and agency employees and their immediate supporters, in that country is against this appropriation, and will fight it here from now on until it is put out of the bill, and will try to keep it out. And every single Member of the House of Representatives from this State who understands the situation, and the men who are the county officials and bar associations in counties within the reservation confines and the principal associations in these counties and the members of the tribe are against this appropriation being made.

I have in my hand a petition signed by hundreds of the members of the tribe, and among the names are the names of 72 men who fought at Chateau-Thierry and in the Argonne Forest and at Sedan for world democracy, and they do not want it. No one will suffer—and I make this statement with a willingness to accept full responsibility—if you take every cent of this appropriation and wipe it out, and it will not cause a single bit of contention or dissatisfaction among any citizens or Indians, white or red, but will be the commencement of the elimination of a bureaucratic control, and a gigantic step toward the reestablishment of a new self-respect and independent spirit among the race, and we here may feel that we are fulfilling our promises of free government to our own as well as to the oppressed peoples of other lands. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I think the House is indebted to my brilliant colleague from Minnesota [Mr. ELLSWORTH], for so clearly stating to the House the actual issue involved, and I hope the House will keep in mind the issue, for it is a simple one after all. He has shown clearly and emphatically that in the hands of the Bureau of Indian Affairs there are really two funds that for a time have been used by that bureau in administering Indian affairs of our State, one a fund of $75,000 or thereabouts, which is one-quarter of the annual interest of the principal sum the Government has in its possession belonging to these Indians, and which they rightfully, under the treaty and the law, can use for educational purposes, and the other fund the one that is now the subject of this discussion. I have had some personal relationship with this fund, beginning back 10 years ago, when against my will I was made a member of the Indian Committee.

I do not now recall the exact sum that first year we appropriated here, but I think it was a very few thousands of dollars. I do know that we started this fund as one that Congress could use to make specific and particular appropriations for particular things we wanted done in Minnesota. We used it to build bridges, we used it to build roads, we used it to build hospitals, and we have built several in the State for the convenience of the Indians. There may have been some doubt as to the wisdom of these steps, but there could not be any question but that Congress had the authority itself to appropriate the money; but we found as year by year went by, though we had in each instance appropriated these sums for a specific and particular purpose, the amount never was reduced. The next year it was increased for some reason or other and put in a lump sum in the hands of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and that office has been using it not for this particular purpose, not for the education and civilization of the Indians, but to pay the salaries of a large number of employees in that State who are anything but a blessing to the Indians under my conception of the case. Their work may be proper and I may be wrong in saying that I think the Indians' interests would be served by the elimination of at least one-third of those men there, and even though I may be wrong in that contention and it is the desire and the wisdom of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Congress to appropriate a lump sum to Minnesota in this bill in its present condition, you have no right to reach your hand down into the pockets of the Indians and take their money for that purpose. Every time you do it you are building a claim against this Government, and in years to come you will have these Indians here rightfully asking that you should give them a jurisdictional act to bring a claim against the Government to repay every dollar of this money that is thus being expended.

That money belongs to the Chippewa Indians of my State, guaranteed to them by a sacred treaty entered into between them and us. We have no right to spend one dollar of it to pay salaries and wages of employees of the Government in connection with Indian affairs in Minnesota, and if we do it we are not a wise guardian of the wards committed to our trust. Now, my friends, that is all there is to this entire question. It is in violation of the treaty and is in violation of what I conceive is good administration. There should be an investigation of the entire subject, that Congress may have the facts upon which to determine a policy for the future. There was somewhat of an investigation recently made by the Indian Bureau, and, without mentioning much about that, I can say to you in substance this, that they found there were many unnecessary employees in Minnesota in the Indian Service, and they recommended their elimination. I am not prepared to say just how much money it should cost to run the Indian affairs of my State, but I am prepared to say this, though it is the last word I ever speak on this floor on the Indian question, you have no right to appropriate one dollar of this sum for the purposes expressed in this paragraph. If you want to maintain the service there, take it out of the Treasury of the United States and not out of the pockets of those Indians, who are, most of them, poor, for, although you think they have a big sum, most of them are living in absolute poverty, many of them at least living in poverty and working their fingers off to get a living. Do not take their money for an unhallowed and unlawful purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to my colleague [Mr. STEENERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota used six minutes and yields three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like the other side to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] for five minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, for 29 years the members of the Chippewa Tribe in Minnesota have been asking Congress to reduce or eliminate this item. While the money should ostensibly be used for the purpose of civilizing the Chippewa Indians, this item becomes larger and larger as the Indians become more and more civilized.

I presume that if it is allowed to go unchecked the item will ultimately cover the balance that the Indians have in the Treasury of the United States.

In looking over the expenditures, I find that the department spent $103,000 for agency expenses last year, while they only spent $61,000 for schools. Now, I do not maintain, nor I do not believe there is a man on the floor of this House who will maintain, that a staff of agents and clerks is necessary in order to educate and civilize the Indians. Our Indians are civilized. I do not like to refer to them as anything but American citizens. They will compare favorably with any community in the country, and why they should be such an object of concern on the part of the Indian Committee I can not understand. I sincerely hope that this committee will strike out the item as proposed by my friend and colleague [Mr. ELLSWORTH]. [Applause.]

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota, my colleague [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I question the right of the gentlemen having time limited to them to yield it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the five-minute rule a Member has no right to yield time, but under this present arrangement, which changed the five-minute rule, a certain amount of time was allotted to individuals, and the Chair thinks that those individuals have the right to consume it or to allot it. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] had three minutes, and he yields his colleague two minutes, and that gives the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] six minutes altogether.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, there came before this committee two separate bodies, representing various Indians in Minnesota, and they had opposite viewpoints to some extent, but they did agree that these agencies and schools should be continued, but that the expense for the same should be paid by the Government and not by the Indians.

It is conceded that there is some misunderstanding with regard to the legality of the spending of these various moneys, but the committee decided, after listening to all sides, that it would be almost fatal, as I said a few moments ago, to discontinue all of the agency activities up there that the department is paying for out of this appropriation. Therefore we decided that if we were permitted to make a careful investigation, perhaps another year we might be able to knowingly reduce the item to nothing. But we hoped to be able to investigate that by being permitted to have a portion of the committee go to Minnesota and having a personal opportunity to investigate the affairs there on the ground. But some one has seen fit to knock out that section of the bill, and so we will be unable to do that. But it is my belief that we should continue this item of $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, to my mind this is a question for the discretion of Congress in carrying out a solemn treaty with the Indians. The Chippewa Indians of Minnesota were possessed of several million acres of valuable agricultural and pine lands, which in 1889 they ceded to the United States, and the proceeds from those lands and timber were to be used for their benefit in certain ways which were specified in the treaty. During the years that have passed since that time practically all of their timber has been logged and sold and all the other land has been disposed of to settlers, so that they will never realize any more from their ceded possessions. Their property has been sold and converted into cash. Some ten or twelve million dollars were realized and some five or six million dollars have been spent for their benefit and in administration. Now there are about $6,000,000 left in the Treasury to their credit.

The treaty provided when the terms of the treaty were carried out the funds realized should remain in the Treasury and draw 5 per cent interest for 50 years; that it should not be distributed for 50 years at least, or perhaps more, if the land was not all allotted, and the income from this interest was to be distributed three-fourths per capita and one-fourth for schools, which now amounts to $75,000 for schools and $275,000 for per capita distribution, $300,000 in all annually.

There was another clause in regard to the disposition of this fund which said that in the discretion of Congress we might set aside a part of the principal fund for promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians. It reads as follows:

That Congress may in its discretion from time to time during said period of 50 years appropriate for the purposes of promoting civilization and self-support among the said Indians a portion of said principal sum not exceeding 5 per cent thereof.

When the treaty was made, Mr. Rice, whose statue is out here in Statuary Hall, and who was a great friend of the Indians who represented the Government in the negotiations, was asked by the Indians at their council what was the meaning of that clause. He said, in substance, that that afforded a fund that in case of "unforeseen misfortune," such as loss of crops, or something of that kind, might be resorted to out of the principal fund. Here is the exact language of Mr. Rice as found in the printed report of the negotiations:

There is a clause providing that Congress may in its discretion, from time to time, during said 50 years, appropriate for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians, a portion of said principal sum not exceeding 5 per cent thereof. In the case of failure of crops, or any unforeseen misfortune, here is a storehouse of money to be drawn upon for your wants.

The rule for interpreting this very treaty was laid down by the United States Supreme Court in Minnesota v. Hitchcock (185 U. S., pp. 395-396). The rule governing the construction of this agreement and cession is stated as follows:

The language used in treaties with the Indians should never be construed to their prejudice. * * * How the words of the treaty were understood by this unlettered people, rather than their critical meanings, should form the rule of construction. * * * The recognized relation between the parties to this controversy, therefore, is that between a superior and an inferior, whereby the latter is placed under the care and control of the former, and which while it authorizes the adoption on the part of the United States of such policy as their own public interests may dictate, recognizes, on the other hand, such an interpretation of their acts and promises as justice and reason demand in all cases where power is exerted by the strong over those to whom they owe care and protection. The parties are not on an equal footing, and that inequality is to be made good by the superior justice which looks only to the substance of the right, without regard to technical rules framed under a system of municipal jurisprudence, formulating the rights and obligations of private persons equally subject to the same laws.

The rule always applied in such cases by that court requires that we should place ourselves in the position of the parties and find out in what way the Indians understood the treaty at the time it was made and give effect to it accordingly. The conclusion follows that the fund in question is a trust fund in the control of the United States to the credit of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, and any expenditure therefrom must be in accordance with the provisions of the trust. The trust expressly limited the expenditure of any part of the principal sum to unforeseen contingencies that might arise. Before any part of the principal sum could be used for the special purposes indicated, express authorization of Congress is necessary, and before Congress can lawfully give that authorization it must first find that said unforeseen contingencies, such as the failure of crops, exist and that it is necessary on account thereof to make the appropriation. As no such condition exists we insist that Congress has no lawful right to make the appropriation asked by the Indian Bureau out of our trust funds this year.

The idea of the Indians in making that treaty with our Government, as is apparent from the proceedings, was to create a permanent fund, the income of which should be used for their benefit. During the accumulation of this fund from the proceeds of cutting timber and other sources they used about $6,000,000 for the benefit of the Indians, but now, when the operation is complete, I submit to the Congress that it would be bad faith to diminish from year to year the patrimony, the principal fund, of the Indians. If you could take out $100,000 or $500,000 from time to time, you would destroy the whole fund long before the 50-year period had expired. The children unborn should have the benefit of that fund. Mr. Rice was far-sighted; but if you authorize the Indian Bureau to withdraw $100,000 or $500,000 or $1,000,000 each year, this fund will be destroyed and in 50 years there will be nothing left of it, and the treaty would thereby be violated.

Although left to the discretion of Congress, that discretion must be exercised fairly in favor of carrying out the intention of the parties. Is it carrying out in good faith the provisions of that treaty to use this money so as to diminish and destroy the principal fund to which the Indians look as a source of income for themselves and their children forever, for the purposes there indicated? If it were used for that purpose, as indicated by Mr. Rice, that would be one thing; but this term, "promotion of civilization and self-support," has been misinterpreted by the bureau to mean paying out money for purely agency administrative expenses, and thereby they violate the spirit of the agreement made with the Indians.

When the white man makes a compact or treaty with the Indians, as this one was made, it becomes our solemn duty to carry it out in the utmost good faith. Although I hope these agencies and the supervision necessary will be continued, yet I am not willing to violate the terms of the trust to do it.

It seems to me this demand on the part of the bureau is a distinct violation of the solemn agreement on the part of the United States with these Indians, violating the spirit of the contract, and however beneficial the expenditure of the money might be, I can not give my consent to it. Some other way should be found to relieve the Indians.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Does the gentleman propose to ask for direct appropriations for this purpose out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. STEENERSON. No. If you have $75,000 for schools I think they could get along.

The contention is made that you must make this appropriation either out of the trust fund or out of the Treasury. Well, the report on this bill says that out of the total of $11,000,000 only $3,000,000 is reimbursable, so that you are taking $8,000,000 by this bill out of the Treasury to administer the affairs of Indians in other States. You say your policy is not to do this where the Indians have funds of their own available. But does your policy require you to violate treaty obligations rather than resort to the Treasury? I think not. The true policy would be to resort to the Treasury rather than violate faith or neglect our wards.

I do not want to continue to vote for this year after year when it is in violation of the trust conferred upon the Government by the treaty and the equitable rights of the Indians under it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] has eight minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if there is a man in the Congress of the United States who can tell us what would be the right thing to do with reference to this Chippewa matter, I have not yet been able to find him.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I hope the gentleman will not take my time. I have only eight minutes.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. The gentleman is not so vitally interested as we are. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Well, be brief.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. If there is not a man in the Congress of the United States who knows what ought to be done, would you advise the spending of the money for that purpose?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If it is necessary for the support and civilization of the wards of this Government, I would say "Yes."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the only authorization, as I recall—and I may be wrong, and I will yield briefly to be corrected, if I am wrong—the only authorization for this amount that I recall is the treaty of 1889. Therefore, it can not be contended that if we are appropriating money in pursuance of the treaty we are violating the treaty to appropriate that money.

I have full sympathy with the contention of the gentleman from Minnesota. We had the same condition in our country for many years. The Secretary of the Interior was permitted to go into the tribal funds of our Five Civilized Tribes, to reach in up to his elbow, take what he wanted, and spend it for almost any purpose in the world that he desired. Fortunately, we had that changed, except for three purposes, but the Secretary is still authorized to use in Oklahoma specific amounts for schools from tribal funds, and that without annual appropriations by Congress.

This treaty of 1889 provided that these funds should be divided among the Indians at the end of 50 years, but that until that time these expenditures might be made. If these Indians are civilized, and many of them are—I have met a great many of them who are very highly civilized men—the mistake that they made was in making this treaty, in agreeing that those funds should be held as a tribal fund for 50 years at the late date of 1889; because of that provision this fund can not be divided per capita until 1939.

Mr. KNUTSON. In 50 years there will not be anything left of the Chippewas.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That emphasizes what I have said as to the inadvisability, so far as the Indians are concerned, of having made that treaty. The Indian made a mistake when he made that treaty. What ought to be done is that this committee or some committee of the Congress ought to be authorized to go upon the reservation in Minnesota and investigate those affairs and find out just what should be done for these people, and come back and report a comprehensive plan for the settlement of this matter. But until it is done I can not give my consent to an agreement to strike out an item which may leave these people destitute, without schools, without support, without civilization.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I desire to ask if a year ago, when this item was up, there was not an understanding between the gentleman and myself that we would let this item go for that year, but that an investigation should be made so that the committee might have the facts, and that this year we would know what to do? Now we are right where we were then, and it seems to me the only sensible thing to do in order to bring the Indian Bureau to its senses is to strike this out.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. We had some such agreement as that; but I want to say that I think if the position of the House, after it ran over the Indian Committee last year, had been insisted upon in conference, as gentlemen know I desired to do, we would have had this year the specifications laid on the barrel head, to use a slang phrase. But I fear some of these gentlemen from Minnesota were too easy to make an agreement with reference to this matter. Therefore, when the matter came into the Senate I was importuned to let it be adopted in the House, to let the $185,000 remain in the bill, about which I had a great deal of misgiving at that time.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I want to say that the gentleman played absolutely fair in every respect in regard to it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. After having been defeated in the House, I expressed myself that as a conferee of the House I had no purpose whatever except to carry out the mandate of the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these schools will probably not be stopped. This destitution will probably not come to these Indians in case the appropriation from this fund is denied by Congress. The thing that probably will be done is that an appropriation will be made from the Federal Treasury to take care of these matters. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], with whom I have served on the committee, knows that I have always favored paying the expenses of an Indian tribe out of the Indian tribe's funds when it could be done without violating an obligation to them.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Make it short.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Has the gentleman ever seen a statement of what was done with the $75,000, the proportion of the interest which was to be used exclusively for school purposes?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I never have.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Does the gentleman know, then, whether or not that would cover the amount necessary to be expended?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I only know what was stated in the hearings. I think it was stated there that that would not be sufficient to carry on the schools and other activities of the Indians. Now, I hope the gentleman will let me proceed, because he had a great deal more time than I have.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I think that was clearly shown in the hearings.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Now, let us see what the Indians themselves say about that. Here is Mr. Coffee, who, by the way, said he represented 100 per cent of the Indians. I read from the hearing at page 46:

Mr. HAYDEN. If we should discover, by looking into the facts, that some part of this money was used to maintain the Chippewa schools, would you be in favor of appropriating it?

Mr. COFFEY. The Indians so regard it. The Indians do not want the schools abolished. They want their children to receive the education they are entitled to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Then the only thing you are in doubt about is that you do not know what part of this $160,000 is being used for the schools?

Mr. COFFEY. I have never looked into that.

Mr. HAYDEN. But if any part is going into the schools you are satisfied to have it go in here?

Mr. COFFEY. If it is going in properly, I am; certainly.

Mr. HAYDEN. What you are trying to get away from, then, is the agency and administrative features. You think those could be abolished without injuring the Indians?

Mr. COFFEY. The agency, I believe, should be maintained with the funds of the United States. It is the business of the United States.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is the point we have discussed here a great many times. You think that the work of the agency ought to be maintained, but ought to be maintained out of the funds of the United States, and not out of the Chippewa funds?

Mr. COFFEY. Yes; we believe the agencies should be maintained. They are necessary, as a matter of fact, because the conditions up there are such that supervision over the greater number of the Indians is necessary.

Mr. HAYDEN. But you do not want to pay for the agencies; you want the United States to pay for them.

Mr. COFFEY. Let those pay for it who have the right to pay for it. Let the expense fall where it belongs.

Mr. HAYDEN. Then there comes a conflict between the competent and incompetent Indians in that reservation. You want the competent Indian to have his own money and not pay any part of this expense, and the incompetents to have all the expense of caring for their business paid by them; is that the idea?

Mr. COFFEY. If that is the condition. Those who get the benefit of the administration should pay for it.

Mr. HAYDEN. You think those who are competent and do not need supervision and do not get any benefit from it should not pay for it?

Mr. COFFEY. I believe if a man is competent and has got his property, he should get out.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAYDEN) there were—ayes 32, noes 17.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States the sum of $2,000 of the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota and to pay said amount to the county of St. Louis, in said State, in lieu of the expenditure of a like sum for the employment of Indian labor on road work under an agreement between said county, the superintendent of the Fond du Lac Indian School, and the firm of A. C. Willcuts & Son, of date June 26, 1917, approved by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior on September 28, 1917.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a motion to insert a new paragraph. Gentlemen will recall that last year, and I think the two preceding years, the Minnesota part of the Indian appropriation bill contained a paragraph appropriating $10,000 out of the tribal fund of the Chippewa Indians to pay expenses of the annual tribal or general council, which they have had since 1913. For some reason that I am not aware of that does not appear. Therefore I offer the following amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, what became of the point of order reserved on the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand that any point of order was reserved.

Mr. FOSTER. I reserved a point of order when the paragraph was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear it. If the gentleman states he reserved a point of order, the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I reserved the point of order, but there was considerable confusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER I want to inquire about the tribal fund and this amount payable to the county of St. Louis.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think I can explain that, and I am responsible for its being in the bill. I do not think it is subject to a point of order, but it is natural for the gentleman to make inquiry. About two years ago the Indian bill contained an appropriation of $10,000 to build roads on the Indian reservation in Minnesota. By arrangement between the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate and the Indian Office and myself, it was agreed that $6,000 of this $10,000 should be expended in connection with the Fond du Lac Reservation, in Minnesota, to complete an important project of a road through that reservation, on condition that the county of Carleton should spend $3,000 and the county of St. Louis should spend $3,000. And, mind you, the last two sums to be spent within the Indian reservation. They carried that out. Carleton County has been taken care of. St. Louis County spent over $12,000. None of the $3,000 that was given to the county of St. Louis has ever been paid to that county for this reason: The bill contained a provision which required contractors to hire Indian labor, and when they got ready to construct the road the Indian labor could not be had, and they had to employ a number of white people. The $2,000 is to take care of this matter. One thousand went for Indian labor.

Mr. FOSTER. They built the road, but built it with labor other than Indian labor?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, after line 21, insert the following as a new paragraph:

"That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians of the State of Minnesota, is hereby appropriated to pay the expenses of the general council of said tribe, to be held beginning in July, 1919, pursuant to the constitution of the general council of the said Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, organized in May, 1913, and to pay the expenses of said general council in looking after the affairs of said tribes, including the actual and necessary expenses of its legislative committee in visiting Washington during the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, said sum to be immediately available, and said actual and necessary expenses to be approved by the president and secretary of the general council and certified to the Secretary of the Interior, and as so approved and certified to be paid."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HAYDEN. I rather think it is.

Mr. FOSTER. Where is the law that provides for it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This is an appropriation of money out of the Indian fund for Indian purposes, and that certainly is within the purview of the bill we now have before us.

Mr. HAYDEN. But it has been argued all afternoon that we could not appropriate any money out of the funds of this tribe of Indians unless authorized by treaty, and the gentleman can not find anything in the treaty to authorize this.

Mr. MILLER of Minesota. The gentleman is facetious, but I will say in reply to the gentleman that this particular item is one that the Indians asked for.

Mr. HAYDEN. If there is nothing in the treaty providing for it, it may not be appropriated.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman knows full well that the treaty provides for certain expenditures, and this is a request on the part of the Indians.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no doubt that this is subject to the point of order, but I think if the gentleman will make an explanation of the matter it will be satisfactory.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I did not intend to discuss the point of order, but I did not care to give up any defense that I might have.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois reserve the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman desires to say a word, I shall reserve it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, there is no tribal government as such of the Indians in our State, but some years ago the Indians, recognizing their great property interests and their desire to have harmony among themselves, for their betterment, and to urge their interests before Congress and elsewhere, conceived the idea of having a general council, which was to meet at a central point, consisting of delegates from the various scattered reservations, and you know the Indians in Minnesota are widely scattered, there is no connection between any two of them. This was with the full consent and I think approval of the Indian Office. They organized this first in 1913, and each year they have met at some place within the State, and they maintain a legislative committee here at Washington. This is to provide the expense of that general council and delegation here at Washington.

Mr. FOSTER. Does this help to civilize those Indians?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think it is extremely helpful in practical civilization.

Mr. FOSTER. Do they partake of peyote at these meetings?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, my Indian lore is fairly extensive, but not sufficiently so to enable me to fully comprehend that which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman does not know what they do there, I do not believe we ought to permit it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Why does the gentleman so carefully eliminate from the amendment the phrase "at Bemidji, Minn."?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There are two bands of representatives here, and I am not going to take any side as between them, but they really are both asking Congress for the same thing.

One wants to name one place and one wants to name another, and I am not going to take sides but let the Indians settle it themselves.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think the gentleman does take sides.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How?

Mr. HAYDEN. Because he states this meeting must be held pursuant to the constitution of the general council of the said Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, organized in May, 1913.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is the language always used describing how the council is to be called.

Mr. HAYDEN. One of those factions is acting in pursuance to this constitution and one is not?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If one is, it is the only legal constituted faction. I think both claim to represent the council. This provides for one council to be called by these Indians.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman is leaving it to the Indian Office to determine what is the legally organized body.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am not going to take sides.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if this $10,000 will help to civilize the Indians in gathering together and having a grand round-up. I expect I ought to make the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I hope the gentleman will not. This money is to be spent by the Indians; it is the Indian's own money, and he wants to spend it on that council——

Mr. FOSTER. This is a different thing——

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. There is nothing more the Indian enjoys.

Mr. KNUTSON. Should not that item have been in the legislative bill?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Does not the gentleman have in mind the item which is always carried in the bill of $1,000 for a sort of jubilee which they have each year?

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I did not know but what the gentleman had that in mind.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from Minnesota both think that this council ought to be held, knowing the gentlemen so well, I do not believe I shall insist on the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Do not do it.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma, if he is in favor of this appropriation for some expenditures, why was it left out of the bill?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. It is on account of the fact it was not reported, and for some reason or other no hearings were held on it, and, as the gentleman knows, I was sick when the hearings were held, and I was not present.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISSISSIPPI.

SEC. 9. That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $75,000 for the full-blood Choctaw Indians of Mississippi in the Indian appropriation act of May 25, 1918, is hereby reappropriated for the same purposes for which originally appropriated and for aiding the common schools attended by the children of said Indians under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. As intimated yesterday there is new language from that carried in existing law in the present paragraph.

Mr. HAYDEN. That language was inserted by the committee in the belief that the best way to civilize the Indian children is to pay for their schooling in the public schools where they may attend with the white children. That is the quickest way to educate them if it be possible to make such an arrangement. It has been found to be highly advantageous in all parts of the United States to pursue that policy.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Oklahoma yesterday stated there were some schools in Mississippi, in this Indian country, which were established by the State for the separate education of Indian children.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That is true; but they are nothing like adequate for the number of Indian children in Mississippi.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this provision for the support of Indian children attending public schools?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I did not know that provision was there until to-day. The history, if the gentleman will yield to me, is this: The State of Mississippi maintained for a number of years and continues it about three or four schools known as schools for the Indians, public schools, part of the public-school system.

They were very inadequate. The appropriation for them, to begin with, was inadequate, and experience showed that the Indian children did not attend very well, largely because neither the child nor its parents appreciated the need or the necessity for it. As I understand the object of this provision, though I said I did not know it was in there until to-day, it is that these Indian children may go to school, if it is so decided, where white children are also in attendance, and by that means will make more rapid progress in the learning of English and in their education and civilization.

Mr. STAFFORD. It virtually changes the provision made last year which authorized the Director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to establish separate schools for their education and provides for their education in company with white children in existing schools.

Mr. HAYDEN. He may do it either way.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I was not in sympathy with the amendment that was carried last year authorizing the Director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to establish separate schools. That is the existing law. Seventy-five thousand dollars was appropriated, but not a cent has been expended. Of course we realize this is a raid on the Treasury, but having been consummated last year there is nothing else I see to do except to allow it to go through. Therefore I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 14746, the Indian appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Hastings oil and gas lease amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on all of the amendments except the Hastings amendment, on which a separate vote has been asked by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Hastings amendment.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I do not believe there will be any objection on this side of the Chamber to meeting at 11 o'clock if we can have an understanding that there will be no roll call pressed on the vote on this bill to-night.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman if there is going to be a roll call on this particular amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand from private sources, there is going to be a demand made for a roll call.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can we have an understanding that if there is a point of no quorum made on the vote on the pending amendment that all matter will go over until to-morrow?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, we are very anxious to settle this matter to-night, but in view of the situation that confronts us I feel disposed to agree to move to adjourn just as soon as we can arrange an agreement as to the time of meeting to-morrow.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let us get an agreement, then, that the yeas and nays be ordered immediately after the meeting in the morning. Why not meet at 10.30?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is too early. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee there will be no objection to meeting at 11 o'clock, with the understanding that the yeas and nays be considered as ordered on the vote demanded by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make that as a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the yeas and nays be considered as ordered on the Hastings amendment the first thing in the morning, when we get to it, and that the House meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DEWALT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, January 25, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Acting Secretary of Commerce submitting a paragraph of legislation extending for the fiscal year 1920 the unexpended balance of appropriation made by act of July 3, 1918, for punching machine, Fourteenth Census (H. Doc. No. 1720); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting tentative draft of a bill to provide for connecting parkway between Rock Creek and Potomac Parks (H. Doc. No. 1721); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 25, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Infinite and Eternal Spirit, before whom angels and archangels bow in adoration, we, Thine earthly children, humbly and reverently bow before Thee, that we may worship Thee in spirit and in truth, and by the uplift of the moment receive that strength which shall enable us faithfully and efficiently to fulfill the obligations of the hour. In the name and spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 5354) extending the time for the completion of a bridge across the Delaware River, authorized by an act approved the 24th day of August, 1912, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. WARREN as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 214. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 214. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE TO PRESIDE ON SUNDAY, JANUARY 26.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates Judge WATKINS, of Louisiana, to preside to-morrow.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday there was an agreement that a yea-and-nay vote be had upon the Hastings amendment to the Indian appropriation bill. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14746) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, so as to give the privilege to the entire membership to vote, I wish at the proper time to make a point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Hastings amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, that is a committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, on that vote I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the amendment will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 198, nays 69, answered "present" 2, not voting 161, as follows:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMBASSADOR FRANCIS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the debate on the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill last Wednesday the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] made this statement:

> I have wondered if the distinguished gentleman from Virginia is aware of the fact that our allies had to call the attention of the Department of State to the personal conduct and associations of our ambassador with certain of his friends of Teutonic tendencies.

This statement was made in reference to Ambassador Francis, our ambassador to Russia. As an evidence of the accuracy of the statements of the gentleman from New York, I desire to have read a letter I have received from the Acting Secretary of State, Hon. Frank L. Polk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have read a letter from the State Department. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE COUNSELOR FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 23, 1919.

Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. FLOOD: My attention has been called to a statement by Mr. LAGUARDIA, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday's date, in criticism of Ambassador Francis, to the effect that—

"Our allies had to call the attention of the Department of State to the personal conduct and associations of our ambassador with certain of his friends of Teutonic tendencies."

In justice to Mr. Francis, I desire to inform you that no representations have been received from any foreign government regarding improper conduct on the part of Ambassador Francis.

Sincerely, yours, FRANK L. POLK.

[Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Indian appropriation bill just passed.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask unanimous consent that all those who spoke on the bill may have an opportunity to extend their remarks. Several have asked me.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, let us not do that.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I mean only those who spoke on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MANN. I object. Individual Members may present their requests.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks upon that bill.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Indian bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] ask unanimous consent to extend remarks on the Indian bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. On that bill?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Indian bill. Is there objection?

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that we proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up a bill on the Private Calendar. The clerk will report it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can either make a motion or a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I ask unanimous consent that these bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that these bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. That applies to all the pension bills on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It applies to this pension bill. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House insist on retaining one of the most vicious and diabolical rules that was ever adopted by any committee in this House. There is a provision that no member of a soldiers' or sailors' home can receive a pension at the hands of this committee. They require that a man shall absolutely show that he is without means of support, in the first instance. One of the best things to show whether this is the case is whether he is a member of the soldiers' home. There is an old blind gentleman in a soldiers' and sailors' home at Quincy, Ill. He has no friends, no home, nobody on earth to take care of him, but he is in a soldiers' home, and therefore can receive no favors at the hands of this committee. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. There has been more or less talk in the House and elsewhere about discharges from the Army. I have made myself some criticism of the War Department in reference to discharges. I have a letter from Gen. March, Chief of Staff, giving the most complete statement in reference to the policy of the War Department about discharges from the Army which I have seen and which, I think, will be of interest to Members of the House. I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, January 23, 1919.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, addressed to The Adjutant General of the Army.

You inclosed therewith a telegram and letter addressed to you relative to discharges from the Army, with reference to which you say:

"The Department of Labor is incurring great expense in obtaining forces to secure employment for discharged soldiers, and meanwhile the War Department is refusing to discharge soldiers who have employment waiting for them, and also such employment as is very much to the interest of the public to have filled."

In order that it may be clearly understood why the War Department has refused to discharge certain soldiers who have employment waiting for them, it will be necessary to consider the War Department's demobilization policy as a whole.

The War Department studied the question of demobilization very carefully before adopting any policy. Two needs of the country were kept constantly in mind: First, the resumption as rapidly as possible of the normal industrial life of the country, and, second, replacement therein of individuals in the military forces and in occupations which ended upon cessation of hostilities. The War Department gave serious consideration to the plan of making the order of discharge depend on the availability of industrial positions to which the individual soldier might return as opposed to plan of disbanding complete organizations in the order of their availability for discharge.

The former plan was deemed impracticable. It would have involved the processes of appraising the case of each soldier as a separate unit, endeavoring to compare his individual rights to discharge with the rights of all others, and marshaling the priorities accordingly. Even if the likelihood of obtaining employment had been considered by classes, such as farmers, metal workers, municipal employees, etc., it would have been necessary to consider further the relative demand for each class in each separate section. The preliminary investigation necessary to an equitable determination of such a schedule, if practicable at all under present conditions in this country, would have delayed all demobilization beyond reason.

On the other hand, disbandment of complete military units could be and was immediately begun. In this way the military situation was safeguarded and at the same time demobilization was accelerated. If a cross section of industrial or agricultural class discharges had been at once cut across all military organizations, the integrity and efficiency of every unit would have been destroyed at the outset, to the confusion of orderly procedure and the retardation of the whole demobilization program.

The determining principle is that all of our soldiers whose services are no longer needed are entitled to discharge. The method adopted, it is believed, will accomplish that result with least delay, and without favor to those who might have influential friends to intercede for them or to take up their cases individually with the War Department.

The military situation and the actual mechanism of demobilization necessitate the retention in the service for the present of a considerable number of men trained or fitted to do the work required. It is doubtless difficult for these individuals to reconcile themselves to being held when their personal interests lie in their being discharged. But from this there is no escape. For them the emergency is not ended, although the stimulation and excitement of active warfare are over.

As a result of the unit demobilization scheme of the War Department, during the past six weeks upward of 800,000 men and approximately 50,000 officers have been discharged from our temporary forces. This constitutes an average for the whole period, since demobilization got fairly under way, of over 20,000 a day for six days a week. Certain large units organized for oversea service were promptly demobilized en bloc, and during that process the daily discharges ran well over 30,000. In this connection, attention is invited to the discontent caused in England by the fact that the demobilization of the United States troops had proceeded so much more expeditiously than the demobilization of the British.

Such results would have been simply impossible had it been attempted to discharge immediately every soldier who made individual application on industrial grounds. There are hundreds of thousands of men now returned to their families, home communities, and industrial employment who might not have been released for months if the War Department had attempted to inaugurate a scheme of demobilization based largely upon individual requests for individual discharge. The absorption of these men into the general life of the country—their return to productive employment—has assisted in the permanent revitalization of industrial life and has expedited the return of the country to its normal peace-time conditions.

While the War Department realized the impracticability of discharging an army of between three and four million men under a scheme based primarily upon individual applications for discharge, yet the need of some elasticity in the scheme of demobilization was always recognized.

On November 21, 1918, War Department Circular No. 77 was issued, containing the following instructions:

"Department commanders within the United States, commanders of ports of embarkation, and commanders of camps not under the jurisdiction of department commanders or of chiefs of bureaus of the War Department are authorized to discharge enlisted men upon their own application when there is sickness or other distress in the soldier's family, or when he is needed to resume employment in an industry or occupation in which there is urgent need of his services, provided that such discharge will not disrupt or cripple an existing organzation and that the soldier's services can be spared. Consideration will be given to the fact that the machinery of camps must be utilized in the demobilization of the Army, and due regard must be taken that it is not retarded by the discharge of personnel connected therewith.

"The instructions contained herein apply only to individual and exceptional cases and are not intended to release men in large groups or blocks for any general employment or occupation."

Both soldiers and civilians, on learning of these instructions seem to have assumed that a soldier had merely to submit a request for his discharge, stating that he had definite employment waiting for him and that he should immediately be discharged. This was clearly a mistaken interpretation. Only such soldiers as could show themselves to be within the terms of the order were entitled to be discharged. Favorable action could be taken on only those applications which disclosed cases of exceptional merit.

The War Department is convinced that the best interests of the country as a whole have been safeguarded and fairness and equal treatment to the individuals in the Army have been secured by its system of demobilization.

It is recognized that a certain amount of complaint and discontent is inevitable. The soldier who sees his neighbor leave while he is held is sometimes inclined to overlook the relative reasons therefor and declare himself a victim of negligence and incompetence. Criticism was to be expected because of the conflicting interests of hundreds of thousands of individuals, each naturally intent on his own case alone. The accomplishment of this enormous number of discharges is a task of technical complexity, requiring patience and broad vision.

The War Department is keenly interested not only in the formulation of general policies for demobilization but in following up the detailed operation of the machinery of discharge. While, as explained above, it was not at first to the best interest of efficient demobilization to attempt to discharge a comparatively small number of individuals on their pleas for individual discharges, the War Department was on the alert to modify its instructions when changing conditions should justify modifications of policy. Now that most of the large units in this country, whose discharge en bloc had been ordered, have been discharged, the time is arriving when the War Department is able to emphasize the increased application of Circular 77 to individuals. It has now an adequate machine for discharging men, in which the personnel has acquired experience and expertness. It is therefore now able to issue instructions, the effect of which will be to release men to a larger extent than formerly on their individual applications for discharge in cases where definite employment awaits them and it is to the general interests of the country that they should be released. Accordingly the following instructions were published to the Army on January 4:

"Applications for immediate discharge under the provisions of Circular 77, War Department, 1918, will be acted upon as expeditiously as possible and the applicants will be informed of the action taken without unnecessary delay. Deserving cases should be investigated, and where the applicants have not correctly or fully stated their reasons for asking immediate discharge officers should render such assistance as may be necessary to correct them, so that applications may be properly presented and acted upon."

And on January 6 the commanding generals, Eighth to Twentieth Divisions, inclusive, were authorized to discharge enlisted personnel of their divisions eligible for discharge under provisions of Circular 77, War Department, 1918, up to 50 per cent of the strength thereof.

Demobilization is divided into two parts—the demobilization of men from camps in this country and the demobilization of men being sent back from overseas. Gen. Pershing has designated units to return from oversea service, and when these units return all men in the unit are promptly discharged. It would be most unfair discrimination to delay the discharge of any men arriving from overseas in these units while individual request of certain men in the unit for discharge is being considered. It is not practicable to cull out and send back from overseas individuals who desire their discharge on industrial grounds from various units overseas. If there exists a necessity for the unit to remain overseas, it should be maintained in a state of efficiency. If a unit is not needed to be kept up in a state of efficiency overseas, it should be sent home for discharge as promptly as transportation can be secured. To send back individuals from overseas on industrial grounds would effect such a levy from units existing overseas as would disrupt military administration, would honeycomb the units and reduce their efficiency to so low a state that they could not be relied upon to perform the services for which they are maintained overseas.

The War Department, however, recognized that there must be some elasticity and way of securing discharges in exceptional cases even for the units overseas, and the War Department has authorized Gen. Pershing to send to the United States for the purpose of immediate discharge individual drafted or enlisted men upon presentation of convincing testimony to the effect that there exists sickness or other distress in the soldier's family. Further, Gen. Pershing is authorized to discharge in Europe any officer or enlisted or drafted man who entered the service since April 1, 1917, and who submits good and sufficient reasons for requesting such discharge in Europe.

In this connection attention is respectfully invited to the fact that we have practically no troops to relieve the soldiers who are in the service for the emergency only in performing the necessary military duty at home and abroad. The Secretary of War has brought to the attention of Congress the importance of securing at once the legislation requested, authorizing the resumption of voluntary enlistments and reenlistments in the Army. As you know, it is now impossible to enlist men for the regular service, all definite period enlistments having been suspended by the act of May 18, 1918, and only emergency enlistments authorized. We find a number of men at all camps who would like to stay in the regular service if they could enlist at once, but the uncertainty of legislation is likely to induce them to look for employment in civil life, and, therefore, to take the first chance to secure discharges. A considerable force will for some time be necessary at ports of debarkation, supply depots, demobilization, and convalescent centers, as well as to garrison posts along the Mexican border and in our insular possessions. The Navy and Marine Corps are now accepting enlistments. If it were possible to accept Regular Army enlistments at once, some of the men desiring immediate discharge and now held on administrative or other duty could be released. This would help to alleviate discontent and restlessness manifesting itself among drafted men who at present have to be held for necessary military service in this country.

The statement has just been made on the floor of the House of Representatives that the orders for demobilization of the Army were not being carried out in good faith, and that officers failed to grant applications for discharge, because, by reducing the force under them, they would lose their commissions, and that some of these officers wish to keep a large number of men in the service in order to make their jobs more important and more permanent. It is the purpose of the War Department to release all members of our temporary forces in this country except those whose services are essential to the administration of our demobilization and convalescent centers, ports of debarkation, supply depots, garrisoned posts, and stations along the Mexican border, and in our insular possessions.

The only question is how this demobilization can be done in the promptest, fairest, and most efficient manner. Where individual requests for discharges have not been granted in the past, such refusals have been based upon considerations of the greatest good for the greatest number. If facts supporting the charges of denying meritorious applications for reasons of personal advantage are submitted to the War Department, prompt action will be taken against the offenders. The War Department is perfectly aware that in any operation of magnitude of our demobilization, there will be certain individuals who might have received a larger amount of special favor if some other plan had been adopted. It also recognizes that here and there a few cases of real injustice to individuals have occurred, and that individuals who apparently had exceptionally good reasons for immediate discharge were refused discharge by camp commanders. In a machine which has so many parts as there is in the Army, there are unquestionably some commanding officers who lack judgment and energy and who have not discharged all individuals on individual request who should have been discharged. This source of discontent can and should be removed, and every effort is being made to that end. Information is welcomed in all cases, and concrete examples of failure to follow out War Department instructions and of abuse of authority to hold men whose services are necessary will be investigated and corrected.

It is believed that under the present instructions all applications for immediate individual discharge which possess merit will be approved, and that from now on the men in this country still remaining in units not yet ordered discharged by units will be discharged largely as individuals to enable them to resume employment where positions are waiting for them.

Just as an illustration of the injustice that may be done to others and the hardships and injury that may be worked to the service as a whole by premature discharge of individuals in the Army, the following extracts are quoted for your information from a letter from the camp supply officer at one of the demobilization centers with reference to the discharge of an enlisted man in the Quartermaster Corps for whom a great deal of pressure has been brought to bear and whose discharge was finally ordered upon a paper showing that seemed to warrant it. The camp supply officer stated:

"* * * You are advised that Sergt. ——— was discharged from the service on December 26, 1918.

"It has always been the policy of this office to obey orders promptly and cheerfully. However, in this case, after having obeyed the order, attention is invited to the fact that the issue of orders directing the discharge of a certain individual, without consulting the needs of the office to which the soldier has been assigned for duty, works a great hardship upon the office, as well as a seeming injustice to the other men who are retained in the service in order to carry on the work of demobilizing the Army.

"Numerous instructions have been issued by The Adjutant General of the Army and the commanding general of the camp to use every effort to discharge as many men as possible in order to expedite the demobilization of the Army. This office has built up an organization in the Finance Division whereby it can handle from 1,000 to 2,000 men per day, but in order to maintain this organization it is necessary that all the men now on duty be held until such time as the demobilization has progressed sufficient to warrant the discharge of some of the office force.

"The commanding general has informed this office that he has no soldiers available for transfer to this office who are qualified to do clerical work, and that in cases where discharge is recommended it must be understood that such men will not be replaced by the transfer from other organizations.

"* * * The case of Sergt. ——— has no valid claim for discharge. As far as this office can ascertain, his only reason is that he does not care to serve longer. He is a well-to-do planter, without any dependents, and is in good health. His discharge will have a serious effect on the morale of the office, as undoubtedly all the men who have more valid claim for discharge will feel that an injustice has been done them, which sentiment it is believed is fully justified under the circumstances. Practically every enlisted man under the direction of the camp supply officer desires to be discharged at the earliest possible date, but most of them are sufficiently patriotic to serve during the present emergency and while the Army is being demobilized, and in many cases this means a great financial loss, as well as loss of business opportunities.

"Sergt. ——— was in charge of requisitions, and after he was discharged a new man had to be placed on his desk, without giving this office a moment's notice to teach the new man the duties he was to assume. During the past month numerous telephone as well as personal calls have been received from the governor of this State with the view to obtaining the discharge of certain favored men. Similarly, telegrams have been received from Washington, sent by Senators from this State."

I have written at this length because I wish to make it clear that demobilization is not proceeding haphazardly, but in accordance with a very definite and considered policy, and the War Department feels certain that as time passes and the matter is more thoroughly understood and the facts become completely known the country will become convinced that the demobilization was conducted in an efficient and well-planned manner.

Very sincerely, yours, PEYTON C. MARCH,
General, Chief of Staff.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is it in order now to ask that this letter be printed as a House document?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. LANGLEY. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the letter just read be printed as a House document. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the letter just read from the Chief of Staff shows a complete change of policy with reference to the discharge of soldiers. I am glad that the War Department has finally concluded to adopt many of the methods urged by myself, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and others. It is now announced that all the troops on this side not needed for hospital and demobilization purposes will be discharged. There is no reason why this should not have been done before. We are now assured that urgent cases will be acted on promptly. Yet all of us know that in numerous instances where not only the soldier but his whole regiment was doing practically nothing we could get no action. The truth is, as everyone in the House knows, that the War Department had announced its intention of keeping 10 combat divisions in the camps of this country, and that only the severe criticisms made on this course by Members of Congress and the fact that the country was becoming aroused caused a change from this position.

Of course every individual application could not be granted, but the War Department seems to think it a good excuse if the soldier was doing anything whatever. If men were to be drafted simply to work for Uncle Sam at $30 per month, why was not this done in the shipyards instead of paying men from $15 to $40 per day? Yet the administration refused to draft men for this purpose. All of us know of hundreds of men that are pounding a typewriter, acting as chauffeurs for some officer, or doing manual labor around some camp. Meantime, those who not only made no sacrifice, but were drawing high wages all through the war, are nailing down the former jobs of the soldiers, so that when at length they are discharged they are liable to find themselves down and out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of George Harshman, helpless and dependent child of Ezekiel Harshman, late of Company G, One hundred and first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. In 1916 there was carried an item in one of the pension bills granting a dependent child of a soldier a pension of $12 a month. By the time it had passed the Senate a sister of this dependent child, in whose home she lived, died, and the dependent child was then sent to and was in the county infirmary at the time the bill finally passed the Senate. The Commissioner of Pensions has refused to pay that pension because this girl is now in the infirmary. The question I would like to ask is whether the Commissioner of Pensions has any power to neglect to carry out or even to set aside a law that has been duly passed by this Congress and signed by the President?

Mr. SHOUSE. No; he has not.

Mr. KEARNS. On what authority does he withhold payment of this pension? Why does he refuse to put her name on the roll?

Mr. SHOUSE. I can not answer the gentleman's question, because I do not know anything about the case.

Mr. KEARNS. He does refuse to do it, because she is in the poorhouse.

Mr. SHOUSE. All that I can say is, that, speaking for the chairman of the committee, he has no such authority.

Mr. KEARNS. I would like further to ask the chairman of the committee if this girl is entitled to that pension, granted her some time in 1916, whether she would be entitled to back pension?

Mr. SHOUSE. She would be entitled to pay from the day the bill became a law through the signature of the President.

Mr. KEARNS. In case the commissioner further refuses and neglects to put her name on the roll, could the gentleman advise me how I could proceed to compel the commissioner to pay the pension?

Mr. SHOUSE. The gentleman could mandamus him.

Mr. KEARNS. In what court would I proceed in mandamus proceedings?

Mr. SHOUSE. In the Federal court.

Mr. KEARNS. In the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHOUSE. I should think so; that is his residence.

Mr. KEARNS. What has been the custom of the Commissioner of Pensions heretofore? Has that been his practice?

Mr. SHOUSE. That is the only case that I have ever heard of where he has refused to obey an order of Congress.

Mr. KEARNS. Well, he has neglected to do this.

Mr. SHOUSE. Or neglected. That is the only special pension case that has ever been brought to my attention where there have been any such results.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Gilman P. Huff, late of Company G, Twentieth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and master-at-arms, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, strike out lines 15 to 18, inclusive.

Mr. SHERWOOD. In this case the soldier is dead.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I listened attentively to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] relative to a rule of the committee. I heartily approve his remarks. I have one or two bills barred in the committee in the same way. There are many irregularities and discriminatory enforcements of the pension law. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Nancy C. Sloan, widow of Daniel B. Sloan, late of Company B, Sixteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the committee a question with reference to an item that we have passed in the early part of the bill. It is the case of Mary F. Sheerer. I would understand from the reading of the report that this widow found it necessary to get relief by a special bill, because of the fact that she has remarried twice since the death of the soldier and hence did not, under the construction of the Pension Office, get the benefit of the remarried-widows act.

Mr. FRENCH. That is correct.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then do I understand that it is the policy of the committee to give favorable consideration to cases of that kind, pending action upon the Ashbrook bill, which passed this House a year ago and which is now pending in the Senate?

Mr. FRENCH. I would not presume to speak for the committee; I am not a member of the committee; but I would like to say——

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman will pardon me, but it is the committee from whom I would like to hear, because I had been advised that the committee would not consider cases of that kind. I am heartily in favor of their doing so. I have some very worthy cases of my own.

I am curious to know why this case, which seems to come from Idaho, got consideration in the face of what I was told was the rule of the committee, and so if the gentleman will pardon me——

Mr. FRENCH. I want simply to say a word about the desperate situation concerning this case, and I will be very glad——

Mr. CRAMTON. I am speaking of the rule of the committee. I have no opposition to the gentleman's case.

Mr. SHOUSE. I will say to the gentleman, in the last Congress, when we passed the Ashbrook bill—that is, the amendment to the Ashbrook bill—in order to give title to pensions to people who were intended by the committee to be included in the Ashbrook bill as it originally passed and who have been denied on account of the Pension Bureau's construction of the Ashbrook bill, we did not get that bill through and we felt it was not going to be possible to get the Ashbrook bill through in this short session, and so on account of the unusual merit of this case, as it appeared to the committee, this bill was put in this omnibus bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Did the gentleman at the same time he was considering the unusual merits of this case also look into the unusual merits of the case of Margaret Tennant, which has been pending before the committee a year and a half with full proof, which I took up with the committee through its clerk at the beginning of this session and asked its consideration, and was informed that bills of that kind were not being considered, and hence I did not further press its unusual merits?

Mr. SHOUSE. The gentleman is not the examiner for the committee, and the gentleman is not a member of the subcommittee having jurisdiction over these cases, but I know——

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no objection whatever to the item, and I heartily indorse it. I think all of these items, inasmuch as the House has indorsed the policy of giving pensions to these remarried widows in passing the Ashbrook bill a year ago—that all of these items, where the facts justify it, should be favorably acted upon by the committee.

Mr. SHOUSE. The gentleman understands if we succeed in passing the Ashbrook bill automatically those cases will be taken care of.

Mr. CRAMTON. I insist that the committee has turned down many cases because of the rule of the committee, and that there should be consistency.

Mr. SHOUSE. May I inquire of the gentleman—I know the policy of the committee is to try to equalize those things between Members. It may be that the gentleman has had other bills.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have had one.

Mr. SHOUSE. In this omnibus bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. I had one.

Mr. SHOUSE. I dare say it is the only bill the gentleman——

Mr. CRAMTON. The number I have had is not material——

Mr. SHOUSE. It is very material in the compilation——

Mr. CRAMTON. At the time I took it up with the committee I had no other case to press for consideration, and I was advised that there was no use of pressing these cases of remarried widows because of the rule. Now, if that rule has been revoked, I simply desire to know that in order that I may call up my cases which have been pending with complete proof for a year.

Mr. SHOUSE. I think that as many of those cases as possible ought to be passed upon.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am very glad to know the committee will consider such cases.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think the gentleman will get his case in the next bill, if we have another.

Mr. CRAMTON. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I insert in the RECORD a soldier's question, dated January 22, Chicago, and signed by Simon Lanan, father, 1735 West Fourteenth Street, Chicago, Ill., It is the usual letter in regard to the service of a son, and it says:

I have a son, Pvt. Harry A. Lanan, who was sent from Camp Fremont, Cal., to Siberia, Russia. He was then in Company E, Thirteenth Infantry. We have not heard from him in five months; do not know if he is living, sick, wounded, or dead.

Will you kindly try to send us information of what has become of him, as we are much worried, as he used to write regular while in camp, and we hear regular from our other son, Arthur, who was in the same regiment but in another company. We are informed the regiment was divided into others. My wife is nearly prostrated from worry.

Why are our boys kept in Russia when the war is over and we have no war with Russia, and others are being sent home from "over there"?

Any information you can send us will be much appreciated.

Respectfully,

SIMON LANAN.

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, and give notice, I shall call attention to this from time to time. The Congress of the United States has power to declare war. The Congress of the United States has not declared war against Russia, and if our soldiers are making war in Russia we have a right, and it is not only our right but our duty, to know on which side they are fighting over there in Russia. Are they fighting in support of the followers of Kerensky, the gentleman we supported after the fall of the Czar? Are they supporting the Soviets or are they fighting them? Are they supporting the radicals—the Reds? What are they doing in Russia? Mr. Speaker, if any gentlemen upon this floor have any information they are willing to give to me as a Member of Congress from Illinois that I may send to the people of my State who are inquiring of their sons, I shall be glad to have them give that information here and now.

My belief is that we have no more right and that the Commander in Chief had no more right to send the Army of the United States into Russia than he would have to send them to-day into Ireland to subdue the Sinn Feiners or to send them into any other friendly country to take part in the politics of that country. I put this letter in now as coming from one of my constituents who desires to know. He has a right to know why his son is fighting there. The boy did not enlist to fight there; he enlisted to fight the Imperial Government of Germany, and the war with Germany is over. Germany has been brought to her knees, and these sons of ours who are in the Army are threatened to-day with being moved to Russia. And if part of our Army is there, and it is needed, the whole Army ought to be there, or none.

Mr. Speaker, I have made the statement so far as I care to do so at the present time. I shall expect some gentleman, either the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs or some friend or colleague on the floor to explain this matter, and I do this in no sort of antagonism. But we have a right to know why our boys are in Russia. There were, according to the paper, 40 or 50 of them killed there yesterday. Under what banner are they fighting? They are fighting under our banner, but for whose cause? Are they fighting under the swinging of the pendulum that was with the Czar, the autocracy, or the autocracy of the Bolsheviki? Or is there a middle ground? It is the duty of Congress to declare war, and having failed to declare war you have the right to know and demand of the President why our boys are there.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], I desire to say a word concerning the soldiers in the soldiers' homes. They are as well taken care of as any private citizen boarding at a first-class hotel in the city of Washington. It formerly cost the Government $240 a year for every soldier in a home, in addition to a pension, but it has increased to $400 a year owing to the high cost of living. When these soldiers are sick they have the very best of hospital facilities. They are as well taken care of as any person who goes to a first-class hospital in the city of Washington. There may be cases, as referred to by my good friend from Illinois [Mr. KING], where it would be necessary; but as a general rule the Invalid Pension Committee thought it was better to take care of the soldiers first who were depending upon themselves for support or on charity. The reason why, as I understand, the committee—and they were unanimous on that proposition—decided not to take up private pension bills for soldiers who are inmates of soldiers' homes was that there are so many desperate cases outside. This bill contains the names of 116 old soldiers, and that is all. They are desperate cases, and it is the intention, as I understand the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to take care of desperate cases, and no desperate cases have occurred in soldiers' homes.

I have taken dinner occasionally at several national soldiers' homes, the one at Marion, Ind., and many others. I undertake to say their noonday meals are as wholesome and plentiful as I am allowed to enjoy in what is called a first-class hotel in Washington, and the orchestra, which inspires the appetite, much better. It may be possible there are some cases in some of these homes that ought to be taken care of. All these soldiers in soldiers' homes, State and National, are now drawing liberal pensions. Did the gentleman appear before the committee in behalf of any cases?

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Soldiers' and Sailors' Home at Quincy, Ill., is supported entirely by the State of Illinois. Why should a man be deprived of his pension due from the National Government when he is in a soldiers' and sailors' home supported by the State?

Mr. SHOUSE. The gentleman is mistaken. The Government contributes $100 for every soldier in the State of Illinois or Dodge City, Kans., and every other State soldiers' home in the United States.

Mr. KING. Independent of that question, I wish to say that there stands the poorhouse and here stands the soldiers' home. If a soldier chooses to go to the poorhouse, he can get a pension; if he goes to the soldiers' home, he is debarred from a pension.

Mr. SHOUSE. He gets a pension under the general law that all of them get.

Mr. KING. I mean a special bill.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of George P. Clayton, late of Company E, Fifty-third Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making reply to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the question of pensions to the members of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. I am in accord with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] has said against a strict or stringent rule which forbids a man who is a member of one of these homes for disabled volunteer soldiers receiving a pension under the ruling of this committee. It has been my observation, and it is my present observation, of these national soldiers' homes for disabled volunteer soldiers that no place or institution, of whatever character or caliber, is as good as one's private home. And I think that the policy of the Government should realize and recognize that these old men are wards of the Government and afford them every possible facility for their welfare. And if their welfare can be better accomplished in their own homes or in the homes of certain of their relations, their children, or, indeed, their grandchildren, it seems to me there is no logical reason why such a person may not be accorded a pension under the rules of the committee and under proper evidence. It tends to relieve the stress upon the soldiers' homes. If one is granted a pension and he is able to go out, he enjoys his own home better than the institution. It is natural that he would. And when he goes out, to that extent at least the institution which shelters the men who can not leave it is relieved and therefore a double good is accomplished—the good of the man who may leave the institution and resume the liberties of the citizen who lives in his own home. There are many men in the different branches of the soldiers' homes who can, with a little financial assistance, such as may be given by a pension allowance, become useful members of society, and that, I think, should be done. And as we face the future and realize that the national soldiers' homes have a new task, and that is the care not only of the old soldiers—and I refer to the soldiers of the Civil War—not only the soldiers of the Spanish War, but the soldiers of the present war, a scheme should be evolved by Congress which will permit all these homes to be availed of in the greatest degree.

Places for rehabilitation of the injured and the sick, where they may be cared for and given opportunity to help themselves as well, should be made of these homes.

I speak of this now at this time because it has been brought up here that this committee has an arbitrary hard-and-fast rule which prohibits men who are in the soldiers' homes from receiving pensions. I do not think such a rule is a good one. I do not think the committee should adhere to it, because I think every case should be considered on its own evidence and on its own individual merits.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to agree heartily with my colleague [Mr. GARD], who has in his district a soldiers' home in Dayton, in the proposition that goes to the question of whether it was the true policy of the Government to establish soldiers' homes anywhere. My position is that the soldiers ought to have been pensioned instead of sending them to soldiers' homes. If that policy had been adopted it would have saved the Government of the United States millions and millions of dollars.

It is true that these soldiers' homes, as my friend has said, are regarded by the inmates, owing to the military discipline, as a sort of prison. Those soldiers are deprived of their home life, of the association of friends of their early manhood, and of their families and the touch of children, and it would have been more humane for Congress at the start of our legislation at the close of the Civil War to have given these soldiers pensions and have allowed them to enjoy their home life instead of sending them to these more like prisons than "military homes."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last two words. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I have served quite a time in this House, and I think it is unnecessary for me to say that I have at all times proven my friendship for the soldier. I believe that in recent years the Congress of the United States has been almost prodigal in its devotion to the interests of disabled soldiers and their dependents. If there be one in the United States to-day whose case merits congressional interference and action and has not received it, it must be due to the fact that that case has not been called to the attention of the Member of Congress in whose district such soldier resides, because Congress in all such cases brought to its attention has responded generously.

I can not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], for whom I entertain a very high regard. I am one of those who believe that when the soldier voluntarily goes into a soldiers' home his pension ought to stop that minute—no, not only the extra sum which might be obtained by special legislation, as suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SHOUSE], who is sitting near me, but all pension. If the Government is taking the care of him which I believe and have always understood it does take, certainly it ought not to pay an inmate of one of these homes the same amount of pension that is paid to the soldier who lives outside the home and who bears the expense of his maintenance and support.

Let me suggest that soldiers are not driven by a generous Government into these "horrible places," as some gentlemen would have us believe these homes are. The soldiers themselves invite the opportunity for admission into the homes. We know, too, that the soldiers of the Civil War are now past the meridian of life.

Mr. SHERWOOD. The average age is now about 75 years.

Mr. RUCKER. Most all those in the soldiers' homes have been bereft of wife and family. They could not maintain a home, because there is no one to minister to the personal wants which age always necessitates and requires. But here the Government, in its magnanimity and thoughtfulness—and I approve and applaud it—has provided a good home, a pleasant home, one to which the soldier looks and into which he seeks admission, where he receives that kindly care and treatment that is ordinarily given by loved ones in their own homes. He is provided with wholesome food, with a good bed, with places of amusement, with medical treatment, and with everything the Government of the United States can provide for his care, support, pleasure, health, and happiness. Therefore I want to repeat, I have for years opposed, and I intend to continue if I remain here to oppose, granting pensions or increased pensions to soldiers who are given the privileges of a soldiers' home. I do not think it ought to be done, and I do not think there is a single soldier in my district who wants it done. When they go to the soldiers' home they accept the benefits of the home in lieu of bounties which the Government would be willing to give them if they were in condition to remain out of the home; and I repeat, they go to the home because it is impossible or impracticable for them to remain out of the home.

When friends from the district I represent visit this city one of the places to which I always take them, conditions permitting, is to the Soldiers' Home, situated just a little northwest from the limits of the city of Washington. I point with pride to that magnificent place out there, overlooking the hills of the Potomac, where so many Regular Army soldiers are so happily cared for and humanely treated, and where they enjoy to the fullest extent the joys and pleasures left in life for them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Jane Shumaker, widow of Henry Shumaker, late of Company H, One hundred and tenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $37 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of Gladys M. Shumaker, helpless and dependent child of said Henry Shumaker, the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: Provided further, That in the event of the death of Jane Shumaker, the name of said Gladys M. Shumaker shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $12 per month from and after the date of death of said Jane Shumaker.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have not been indulging in wild criticisms with regard to the operations of the War Department, although very many letters of complaint have been coming to me concerning the discharge of soldiers. But it seems that in some of these cases it is the duty of a Member of Congress who can obtain no redress elsewhere for his constituents who are suffering to bring the matter to the attention of his colleagues on this floor.

I am constrained this morning to bring one such case to the attention of the House in order that it may reach the War Department, with the hope and expectation that it may result in some action being taken that will facilitate discharges in meritorious cases.

A constituent of mine tells me of a family of Americans residing in the nineteenth ward of my city who contributed to the war all the sons they had, three manly young fellows. They were the support of the mother and the father, but they went into the service to serve the Government. I would like you to picture the home from which these boys went as we contemplate the present situation. These three young men aided in the support of the father and the mother and in the maintenance of the home. They were called upon to enter the service of their country, and did so patriotically, but that home suffered in consequence. My constituent, Mr. B. A. Hyde, writes me as follows:

I am writing you in behalf of Mrs. James Barr, 12 East Montgomery Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa. She had all three of her sons in the Army—George, who is in Company A, Three hundred and fourth Engineers, in France; Robert Barr, One hundred and ninth Infantry, Company M; and Joseph, who is in Camp Dix. Her husband was injured in a trolley-car accident about six weeks ago and is still unable to support her.

In addition to being left without support, the woman is in an extremely nervous condition—in fact, bordering on nervous prostration—and, to make matters worse, this morning she just received a telegram from Washington stating that her youngest boy, Robert, was killed in action July 15, 1918.

I ask of you, if there is any way possible that you could get her boy Joseph his release, will you be good enough to do this? This is an urgent case, and should you desire doctor's certificate or other information, will furnish same at once.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Has there been an application made for the discharge of this soldier?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wrote my constituent that in accordance with the instructions of the War Department it would be necessary for the young man to apply to his immediate commanding officer at Camp Dix, and to send an affidavit stating the facts. I received an answer saying that all this had been done. This was but a few days ago.

Mr. DYER. Why does not the gentleman himself send a telegram to the commanding officer? I will say to the gentleman that ofttimes the applications are held up by young officers who do not forward them to the commanding officer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is correct, but I question whether I should send a communication to a young commanding officer, merely to be snubbed.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman starts out by saying he is calling the attention of his colleagues to this in order that he may get some relief. Now, what relief would the gentleman suggest from a legislative standpoint?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will make a suggestion before I get through. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] interrupted me at the very point where I was about to state my reason for taking the floor. In this case all the orders of the big generals of the Army were complied with. It is my business to look to them. The young man filed his application, submitted his papers, and told of the state of facts. Now, that having been done, this is the answer, and I rose to put this answer in the RECORD. I want the generals to know about their system. Bear in mind, the mother gave up her three sons. Her husband remained with her, but he was hurt in a trolley-car accident, and for six weeks has been unable to give her any support. One boy in France has been killed. The other is somewhere else in the Army. The third is at Camp Dix, only 30 minutes or so away from his home. The mother asked that this boy might be sent back to her. All the formalities ordered by the War Department were complied with, but this is the answer the sorrowing and suffering mother received:

DEAR MRS. BARR:—

This comes from the headquarters auxiliary remount depot at Camp Dix—

DEAR MRS. BARR:—

I want you to listen to this letter, because it sounds like an Abraham Lincoln or a Woodrow Wilson—

Your letter of January 20 received, and it is with the deepest regret that we can not bring about the discharge of your son, Pvt. Joseph Barr, at this time. We hope in the near future to make a material reduction from our personnel—

This is sent to the sorrowing mother, who is presumed to know all about the Army technique—and in such event it is quite probable your son can be discharged—

The mother who gave up three sons is asking for one of them, and her husband is upon his back—

We appreciate your condition and deeply sympathize with you in the days of your sorrow brought about by the havoc of war—

Her son in France has been killed and she has just been informed of it, and her husband has been hurt—

We know that none but a mother can really feel the loss of a son, but in your darkest hours of sorrow you have the consolation of giving that son and offering your other two boys—

Giving them up also, you see, and getting consolation for it—to the grandest and noblest cause that a mother ever made sacrifice.

Very pretty, but not a cheerful prospect for this poor woman, waiting for bread, waiting for money, waiting for a son's sympathy and support——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This letter continues:

Our greatest wish is that the present emergency will alter itself and permit the early return of your boys and the boys of other American mothers who have made the supreme sacrifice.

A beautiful letter, that! A fine tribute, worthy of the Bixby letter written by the immortal Lincoln. But it is signed, not by Woodrow Wilson, not by Secretary Baker, not by The Adjutant General, who tells us to go to "the immediate commanding officer" to get relief for this mother and a discharge for the son. The tribute comes from the second lieutenant of the Quartermaster Corps, probably a very worthy young man, but——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I want to get one minute more for the gentleman to tell us what legislative relief he would suggest. That is what the gentleman started out to do, and he read a letter here in order to suggest that there should be some legislative relief. I want to know what relief the gentleman suggests.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I ask for one minute more, in order that the gentleman may suggest what legislative relief may be given.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that he may have five minutes.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman can suggest any legislative relief, I think he ought to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. He can not do it in one minute.

Mr. GARNER. He can not do it in 50 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

What relief would I offer in a case like this? I would pass a bill or a resolution providing that where such a state of facts as that I have described existed there should be an immediate discharge of the soldier. That the young lieutenant who is holding in leash this soldier less than 50 miles away from the home where the mother is in need of his assistance should release him immediately. I would pass a resolution which would require the Secretary of War, who has delegated these powers of life and death to second lieutenants and subordinate officers all along the line, to listen to an appeal like this and give a decision once in a while as if the Army had some heart and some discretion. It would not disorganize the Army to at least listen to appeals of this kind.

I brought this case before the committee this morning because I have several others of the same kind, as other Members have. We have been driven from battledore to shuttlecock, going from the office in Washington to the camp in Texas or in New York, being told by the War Department here that we must go to the subordinate officers, and by some of them that we must return to the higher powers. We have religiously read the orders of these higher powers, but often they are of no avail when we attempt to observe them down along the line. What excuse can there be now for adding to the distress of a stricken mother who, having heard that her boy has been killed in France and whose husband has been injured by a trolley car, asks that another son in camp and working for a lieutenant or for the Government at $30 a month, a half an hour away from home, be released to go to her aid?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Was the gentleman in the room when the letter was read from the Chief of Staff this morning?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Unfortunately I was not, being in conference on the revenue bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think I can state accurately that the letter recites the methods of demobilization which they are following, and it consists of demobilizing the units, and that they could not consider individual cases on industrial grounds. Is not that in conflict with order No. 77 and these numerous letters which were received from The Adjutant General of the Army saying that for exactly these reasons they could be discharged? Are not these two in conflict, and if so, what can you expect a young lieutenant or a Member of Congress to do? Is it not time that they cleaned their house?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is time they cleaned house.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I had a letter read this morning from Gen. March, the Chief of Staff. As I understood the letter, it provided that where the officers in command in camp did not obey the circular letters of the department for the discharge of the men on account of dependency or illness at home or in such a case as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has illustrated the department here would welcome information which would cause him to at once investigate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was that stated in Gen. March's letter?

Mr. MANN. My understanding of the letter was that Gen. March stated that where an officer in command did not obey the directions of the circular letters the department here would welcome information that would give them a chance to make an investigation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am glad to know it. I have one case now—I did not bring it here, because I do not want to be bringing these cases here every day—in which my application to the War Department was referred to the immediate commanding officer, and by the immediate commanding officer was sent back to me with the positive statement that I would have to go to those higher up. He said he did not have authority to act.

Mr. MANN. I think I have had the same difficulty, but I wanted to see whether the department had changed its views or whether it was making the investigation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope it will make the investigation so that we may know what to do. We ought to have a reasonable uniformity of procedure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more for me to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated in his remarks that this letter that he has read from the second lieutenant was worthy of Abraham Lincoln or Woodrow Wilson. Did the gentleman believe that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I said the language was worthy of Abraham Lincoln or Woodrow Wilson, and might have been copied from language used by Mr. Lincoln or Mr. Wilson.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Does not the gentleman think it was an ordinary circular letter sent to everybody?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; it had all the earmarks of a personal letter; it had the stenographer's mark on it, and I assume the writer intended to console the mother, but it is also probable, as in other cases, that the young lieutenant desired to hold the soldier, because he was doing some special work about the camp.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. I wish simply to suggest that such a letter is not worthy of either Woodrow Wilson or Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 14945) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up the bill H. R. 14945, an omnibus pension bill, and asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Frank Bachmeyer, late of Company B, Forty-fifth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. In reference to the item for Frank Bachmeyer, on page 14, I notice that the amount carried is $12. That is the lowest amount given, and I think in this case it is exceedingly inadequate. I do not know that the chairman of the committee has the facts of this particular case in mind. The testimony of the medical men given in the report shows that he is considerably incapacitated. His employer says that he has to leave his work for a week or two at a time.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. What is the page of the report?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Page 145. I would like to add this to what is reported. I just received a letter from his employer, subsequent to the time I submitted the evidence in the case to the committee. I appreciate that this is not evidence in the case, but I desire to give it for what it is worth. He writes me that Frank Bachmeyer has just been taken away to the hospital and probably may soon die, succumbing to the conditions set forth. He has a wife and four small children. They have been destitute for years. I myself do not think that he can live more than a few months. Could not the gentleman under these circumstances consent to raise the pension to $17 a month? It seems to me that is a very modest request. Twelve dollars is exceedingly low. There is no question about this soldier having properly performed his work in the Philippines, and the testimony is that he was not a shirker; that he suffered from pneumonia in the service, from malarial poisoning and dysentery, and from the date of his discharge—in fact, he was discharged in the hospital—he has been suffering. Twelve dollars a month these days does not go very far, especially when a man has gone to the hospital for the last time.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the figures "$12," in line 20, page 14, be stricken out and the figures "$17" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 24, strike out "$12" and insert "$17."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota) there were—ayes 10, noes 16.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of George S. Taylor, late of Company M, Seventh Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to announce the death of this claimant, George S. Taylor.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. This is the gentleman's case?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in view of what the gentleman has stated, I move to strike out, on page 22, lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, the soldier being dead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, strike out lines 11 to 14, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Helen R. Cantwell, widow of Edward Cantwell, late of Company G, Twelfth Regiment United States Infantry, War with Mexico, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, after line 11, insert as a new paragraph:
"The name of Freda Burow, widow of William M. Burow, late of Company I, Sixteenth United States Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 a month."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment for the reason that it is a case that the Committee on Pensions on two different occasions reported favorably. It was carried in the omnibus bill and passed this House. Upon both occasions it was stricken out by the Senate upon the ground that it was a case that belonged in what was known as the Key pension bill, and that cases of that kind should not be included in special acts, but should wait until the Key bill, pensioning certain widows in the Spanish War, became a law. It was rejected on two occasions, as I say, for that reason, notwithstanding that it is a deserving case. The evidence shows that the husband died of disabilities which, to my mind, were satisfactorily proven as having occurred in the war. The claim was then made to the Pension Bureau in pursuance of the act of Congress pensioning widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men in the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection to meet the suggestion of the Senate.

Now, under date of January 15 this widow is in receipt of a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions which is as follows:

Your above-entitled claim for pension under the act of July 16, 1918, is rejected on the ground that the soldier did not render 90 days actual military service in the War with Spain, as the organization to which he belonged was not within the area of belligerent operations for that length of time during said war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this soldier served a great deal longer than 90 days in the Regular Army. He served from the 4th day of June, 1898, until the 17th day of January, 1899. Now, the act of Congress under which this widow presented her pension claim, which the Pension Office says can not be allowed because the Second United States Infantry in which this soldier served was not an organization within the area of belligerent operations for that length of time during said war is as follows:

An act to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act if any volunteer officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, or any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Establishment who rendered 90 days or more actual military or naval service in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, or as a participant in the Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign between June 16, 1900, and October 1, 1900, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow without means of support other than her daily labor, and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year, or leaving a minor child or children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act: Provided further, That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Now, this soldier rendered more than 90 days, as shown by the report of the Committee on Pensions. Does this law mean that a man who was in the Regular Army must have been 90 days engaged in battle or foreign service all that time? I do not believe Congress ever intended to give advantage to the volunteer over the man who served in the Regular Establishment. This man served much more than 90 days, and yet the Pension Office has rejected it. It is a case, Mr. Speaker, that I have known of personally ever since I have been in Congress. I know the widow; I know the small child left by her husband; I knew about her case when first presented, and I was surprised that it was rejected—a sad case indeed, in which a poor widow has been ill practically all the time, and yet she has never been able to get a pension. There is merit in it. This House has passed it twice, and I now ask, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Pension Office has again declined to consider this case on the ground that it does not come within the Key bill which was passed and is the law, as I have stated, that she be given a pension. I see no objection to it and I am sure there is no foundation for denying to this widow a pension under these circumstances. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I think there is some little merit in the item which the gentleman from Missouri proposes. The Committee on Pensions did make a favorable report on this item, I think in the last Congress or the first session of this Congress.

Mr. DYER. And also one of the preceding Congresses.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. But I oppose this amendment for the reason that it is a bad policy to throw open these omnibus pension bills to amendment. If the gentleman will bring this bill before our committee and give that committee the opportunity to consider the bill again, I think he can get it in the next omnibus bill.

Mr. DYER. The bill has been before the gentleman's committee, and his committee has reported it favorably to the House upon two occasions. It has passed the House upon two occasions, and was only stricken out on account of the attitude of the Senate in saying that it was a bill that belonged to the Key widow-pension bill then pending, and then the Pension Commissioner says that it does not come within the purview of that bill.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I might state to the House and the gentleman from Missouri, while I can not speak for the committee, I have every reason to believe that when the bill shall properly come before our committee they will make a favorable report and pass it through this House, but I am opposed to throwing open these omnibus bills to amendment on the floor of the House.

Mr. DYER. It has been considered and passed twice. This widow and her child have been denied a pension all these years; she has been compelled to live by working out, and yet she is a woman in bad health; and I say it is an outrage that we can not at this late hour secure justice for her when there is no excuse. I would not, Mr. Speaker, feel like rising up and offering an amendment for a bill that had not been considered by this committee; I would not do that. I recognize the necessity of all these matters going to the committee for consideration; but this bill has been considered by the committee, they have reported it twice and it has passed this House twice, and there is no excuse for denying justice to this woman.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. I ask for an additional two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the rate proposed in his amendment?

Mr. DYER. My rate is $25.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. When the gentleman passed this bill—when the committee made a favorable report on the bill in the other Congresses, it passed at a rate of $12.

Mr. DYER. I know; and the Congress since then has enacted legislation for $25.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I think the committee should have an opportunity to pass upon the rate.

Mr. DYER. What rate does it give to the widows of the Spanish War veterans?

Mr. KNUTSON. Twelve dollars?

Mr. DYER. I am willing to accept that, if that is the only objection. I want to get something.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, if it is shown that the death of her husband was the result of disease incurred in the service, she is entitled to $25; otherwise, to $12.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman comes in here with an amendment and none of us remembers anything about the details of this case. If I may, I will ask the chairman of this committee if this item was reported in any bill of the Congress?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. This claim, because of its nature, should have come to the subcommittee, of which I am a member, but I have no recollection of the gentleman's case whatsoever. I think this should go before the committee and be decided on its merits. You can not consider individual pension cases here on the spur of the moment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I repeat this bill has been twice before the gentleman's committee and once during this Congress. It was the bill H. R. 11658, second session, Sixty-fifth Congress. The report, No. 511, accompanying the bill has the following to say regarding the claim:

H. R. 7163. Freda Burow, of 2637a Russell Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., is the widow of William M. Burow, who served during the War with Spain, from June 4, 1898, to January 17, 1899, as a private and corporal of Company I, Sixteenth Regiment United States Infantry. He was discharged at his own request at the close of the war. (W. O. 823555.)

The War Department records show that the soldier was treated for rheumatism from September 14 to October 7, 1898, and for nothing else.

He applied for pension October 22, 1900, on account of rheumatism, chronic diarrhea, malarial poisoning, and sunstroke.

Pension was allowed December 26, 1903, at $6 per month from date of application, for rheumatism. There was no evidence to justify favorable action on account of the other alleged causes. He died December 28, 1904, of phthisis pulmonalis, and March 11, 1905, the widow applied for pension. Her claim was rejected September 15, 1905, on the ground that the death cause was not shown to have been due to the military service.

The soldier never claimed to have disease of lungs in his pension claim, and a medical examination made January 9, 1901, failed to disclose any evidence of such disease. One made April 10, 1903, showed such slight lung affection as to justify no rating, and the board expressed the opinion that the condition of lungs then was due to a recent cold.

The evidence upon file in claim for the accrued pension shows the petitioner is the lawful widow of the deceased soldier.

The widow submitted to the committee the original baptismal record, which shows that the child, Edna Clara Burow, was born April 9, 1900, and baptized June 10, 1900. This certificate was large and ornate and highly prized by the widow, and after being inspected was returned to her for fear it might be impaired.

With the bill the petitioner files an affidavit stating that she believes the soldier's death from disease of the lungs was due to the service, notwithstanding the Bureau of Pensions action of rejection of her claim; that she has no property at all.

The Member by whom the bill was introduced states in a letter to the committee that he personally knows the petitioner, who is an excellent woman but feeble in health, has a 10-year-old daughter to support, and is without any means, possessing no property of any kind. He offers, if desired, to personally appear before the committee.

Your committee have concluded that the death of the soldier may be accepted as due to causes arising out of his military service and justify a pension of $25 to his widow, and it is so recommended.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out "25" and inserting "12."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out "25" and inserting "12." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DYER. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EDITH CAROW ROOSEVELT.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 13879, and ask unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the bill H. R. 13879, and asks unanimous consent to consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13879) granting a pension to Edith Carow Roosevelt.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Edith Carow Roosevelt, widow of Theodore Roosevelt, late President of the United States, and pay her a pension at the rate of $5,000 per year from and after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a roll call on this bill at this time I think would add to the tribute that we pay; and I will make the point of no quorum as a matter of convenience to the Members. However, I will not do it until the vote is about to be taken.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois raises the point of no quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The vote is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 250, nays 9, answered "present" 5, not voting 166, as follows:

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia with Mr. KAHN.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. LEHLBACH.

Mr. WALKER with Mr. STINESS.

Mr. HOWARD with Mr. SNELL.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. HARRISON, is recorded?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to withdraw my vote of "aye" and be recorded as "present," inasmuch as I am paired with him.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. REAVIS, and he answered "Present."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I change my vote from "aye" to "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FOOD SUPPLIES FOR EUROPE.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the food-relief bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the food-relief bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13708) providing for the relief of such populations in Europe and countries contiguous thereto, outside of Germany, as may be determined upon by the President as necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. SHERLEY, Mr. EAGAN, and Mr. CANNON.

HOSPITAL AND SANATORIUM FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 511.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 13026, entitled, "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors"; that there shall be not to exceed two hours' general debate, which debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. After the bill shall have been perfected in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendations as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] in the Chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HARDY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13026, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13026) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Just a moment. It is said to be a short bill. I have not had time to read it, and do not know what is in it. If it should be explained very fully in general debate, that would be better, perhaps, than the reading of it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It will be explained fully in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, under the rule two hours' debate is permitted. I would like to enter into some arrangement as to the division of the time. There is a committee majority report and a minority report. The minority report is headed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER], whom I do not see here, and by the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT and Mr. BARNHART]. I would like to ascertain who is here to take charge of the minority side of the measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask who represents the minority?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that in the absence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER], whose name appears on the minority report, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT] be permitted to control the time in opposition to the measure.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any request desired to be made in the House?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is entirely satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. It is requested that in the absence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] the gentleman named, Mr. ELLIOTT, be allowed to control in behalf of the minority one-half of the time. Is there objection to that request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not the author of this bill. It is a bill which has been suggested by the Treasury Department. While I share the prejudice of a great many of the Members of this House against taking the cue for legislative work from any department, nevertheless I admit—and I think you will all be found to admit—that where special knowledge and information are called for we are bound to rely upon other branches of our Government.

On October 6, 1917, we amended the war-risk insurance act, and we provided in that act that all sick and disabled discharged soldiers and sailors from the Army and Navy of the United States shall be entitled to hospital treatment and hospital facilities for their rehabilitation. But there is a proviso in the measure which, in view of the minority report, I would like to call to your attention now. Under section 300, paragraph 3, I find this provision:

In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services and with such supplies, including artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances, as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary—

And I call your particular attention to the next proviso—

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the necessary military control over any member of the Military or Naval Establishments before he shall have been discharged from the military or naval service.

Now, why do I try your patience by reading these provisions? First, because I want to get them into the RECORD; second, because I want to emphasize the proposition that although the Army has vast facilities for the care of its wounded and for the care of disabled soldiers, it has no authority under the section of the law which I have just read to permit it to care for a discharged soldier. Now, you created the burden upon the United States Government in October, 1917, when by law you promised to give every soldier and every sailor who was wounded in battle, who was disabled in camp, whose body was racked with pain and disease while serving under the flag, certain hospital facilities and certain advantages. What have we done up to date to crystallize that promise into action? Nothing; positively nothing!

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. On page 2 of the minority report it says that according to the testimony of Col. Smith, the Medical Department of the Army is willing to turn over immediately at least two hospitals of a thousands beds to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. Was the gentleman present when that testimony was given?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I surely was.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman kindly amplify on it?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am going to touch on that very proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Can the gentleman tell me if the passage of this law will make it necessary to form another complete organization to take charge of the hospitals that will be erected under its provisions?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; we are not confronted with that difficulty. The United States Public Health Service has been in existence for over a hundred years. It has now under its control upward of 22 hospitals, with a bed capacity of 1,548; but the officials of the Public Health Service testified before our committee that these hospitals are filled to overflowing, and at the present time they have 1,556 patients.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. How many different organizations would we have in the United States, each conducting a line of hospitals, if this bill were to become a law?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Not any more than we have at the present time. This makes no change whatever in the hospital situation in the United States. It adds no bureau. It adds no machinery beyond that which already exists.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Would not that then leave three different classes of boards or organizations conducting hospitals? Would there not be the National Board, which takes care of the veterans of the Civil War, the hospitals which are being conducted by the War Department, and then a new series conducted by this board? Would there not be a duplication of facilities and an increase in overhead expense over what there would be if we had but one board taking care of these men?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No. There is no question of introducing a new organization. The Public Health Service has been in existence, as I said, for many years.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You do not mean to say, do you, that the Public Health Service will not have to be vastly increased to take care of this work?

Mr. GRIFFIN. It will have to be vastly increased, but not due to any initiative on the part of the Public Health Service, but only because of the burden which Congress has imposed upon the Department of the Treasury.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Now, I understand that all these projects that are intended by the Public Health Service are additions to existing naval or marine hospitals, except two, and that it is the intention to build additions or additional bed facilities for these hospitals. And in that case am I right in supposing that part of the administration of a particular post would be under the military authorities and another part of it under the Public Health Service?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman is going too far into the ramifications before we have finished with the generalities.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is not that the testimony before your committee?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; it is not. If the gentleman will bear with me and have patience I will come to that point in a few moments. There was a minority report filed here. You probably have it before you. When that report came in I was in a position which reminded me very much of the predicament of Dr. Samuel Johnson. Old Dr. Johnson was caught by his wife kissing the maid in the hallway, and she said, "Doctor, Doctor, I am surprised." He said "Tut, tut, madam, you are amazed; it is I who am surprised." Now, I was both surprised and amazed, because while the matter was under consideration in the committee no suggestion was made that any minority report would be submitted. I am amazed when I read the report and find that it contains so many deductions that can not be strictly drawn from the hearings.

As to hospitals which the War Department might turn over, let us turn to the extract from the report of Cols. Darnall and Smith, of the Medical Corps, United States Army, quoted on page 5 of the minority report. It is extracted from page 22 of the hearings before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on December 9, 1918 (No. 16). Col. Smith was asked by me at the hearing (p. 19) to recapitulate his testimony showing the number of hospitals in the United States, the number of hospitals on leased ground, the number of cantonments, whether the sites at cantonments are on leased ground, the location and the bed capacity of all the hospitals, and also giving the present use of the beds at all the hospitals and the number that are vacant; in short, a summary and recapitulation of all his testimony.

In doing so, in his report signed by himself and Col. C. R. Darnall, he divides his report into six subdivisions. On page 22, in answer to the question—

What hospitals, if any, can be turned over by the Army to the Public Health Service, and when? Which of the camp base hospitals would be suitable for the treatment of such cases as those for which the War Risk Bureau may need to make provision?

He replies:

It is impossible to state at this time when any of the hospitals now operated by the Army could be released for use by the Public Health Service. While it is believed that we have provision for a sufficient number of beds in Army hospitals it is also our belief that we require all that we now have in order to provide a reasonable margin of safety for the care of sick and wounded returning from overseas, and the sickness problem which may develop among the troops in this country and returning for demobilization.

Although this is the opening part of Cols. Darnall and Smith's report, it is absolutely omitted by the minority report, and no reference made to it.

On page 5 of the minority report they quote the balance of the paragraph, taking particular pains, it would appear, to omit the closing sentence, as follows:

These are two of the least-desirable properties which we now occupy.

There was very good reason for this running to cover. Both of these hospitals are on leased ground. Neither of them were built for hospital purposes. They are General Hospital No. 23, at Hot Springs, N. C., and General Hospital No. 15, at Corpus Christi, Tex. General Hospital No. 23, at Hot Springs, N. C., was converted into a hospital, but General Hospital No. 15, at Corpus Christi, Tex., has not been adapted in any sense whatever for hospital uses.

In regard to the Hot Springs hospital, it may be said that it had to be temporarily abandoned on account of the outbreak of typhoid fever. It is so situated as to be flooded at certain times of the year, and the drinking water is said to be polluted. It was, I may say, for this reason that the German prisoners interned there were taken away.

It may be well in passing to point here to the contradiction between the report of Drs. Darnall and Smith and the exhibit which they annex to their report. On page 22 in the paragraph above mentioned, which is quoted in the minority report on page 5, the capacity of General Hospital No. 23, at Hot Springs, N. C., is given as 700 beds. On page 24 of the hearings (No. 16) the total bed capacity of this hospital is given as 250. This is contained in Exhibit A, annexed to the report of Drs. Darnall and Smith. In other words, the narrative contained in the report and the figures contained in the exhibit do not agree.

Hospitals which the War Department claims to be able, sooner or later, to turn over for the use of the Public Health Service.

[See p. 22, Hearings No. 16.]

	Bed capacity.	Remarks.
General Hospital No. 23, Hot Springs, N. C. (Exhibit A, p. 24, states bed capacity as 250).	700	Leased.
General Hospital No. 9, Lakewood, N. J.	904	Do.
General Hospital No. 13, Danville, N. Y.	268	Do.
General Hospital No. 15, Corpus Christi, Tex.	257	Do.
General Hospital No. 18, Waynesville, N. C.	600	Do.
General Hospital No. 19, Long Beach, Long Island.	1,000	Do.

Furthermore, the statement that the War Department is ready to turn over certain inadequate, insufficient, and unsatisfactory hospitals which they do not want to use is not a very encouraging prospect for wounded and disabled soldiers who are standing at the door of the United States War Risk Insurance Bureau asking that their appeals for medical attention shall be heard.

Furthermore, the turning over of these leased hospitals would not be possible until the passage of this bill provides the means.

To refuse to pass this bill and leave the Public Health Service as an humble supplicant at the door of the War Department asking for cast-off hospital facilities would not be creditable to this Congress. In order to place the Secretary of the Treasury in a position to negotiate with the War Department, or any other department having hospital facilities at its disposal, it is absolutely necessary that congressional authority shall be given by the enactment of this bill into law.

The matters as brought up and emphasized by the minority members of the committee in their report are stale and without significance. They have taken up questions which were raised in our hearings, and, apparently oblivious of the fact that the committee which reported this bill had gone deeper into the questions, they assume that where their examination ended the researches of the committee had ended. On the contrary, the committee pursued all of these questions in all their ramifications to the end, and being aware of the embarrassing situation, amended the bill, making it practically mandatory upon the Public Health Service to secure hospital facilities wherever available in every department of the Government.

On page 3, lines 1 to 16, will be found the committee amendments which authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to request the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Secretary of Labor to transfer unto the Treasury Department such lands or parts of land, buildings, fixtures, appliances, and furniture under their control not required for their uses as may be found suitable for this use, and so forth, and limit the authority by the further proviso that nothing shall be expended out of the amounts authorized by this act until all available buildings, grounds, and so forth, have been turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury.

So that, granting every argument advanced by the minority in their report, the necessity for the passage of this bill is emphasized and rendered stronger.

If you do not pass it, you leave the United States Public Health Service and the War Risk Insurance Bureau at the mercy of every department chief who may have a worn-out hospital to get rid of. Instead of vesting the Secretary of the Treasury with authority, as this bill does, to demand and take over hospital facilities not in use, you put him in the position of a supplicant obliged to negotiate and haggle over terms.

This touches only the departmental end of it, but what have you to say of the situation in which you put the soldiers of our country who have jeopardized their lives and limbs in behalf of their country? Is this an adequate return to make to them?

While department chiefs are haggling over the turning over of hospitals that they do not want which are on leased ground, and when the Public Health Service finishes haggling over the continuation of leases, the crippled and disabled soldiers will walk the streets without care and attention.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I have not yet completed the reading of the bill, but I have gone far enough to find this language: That the Secretary of the Treasury is to utilize the Public Health Service, and so on, and I read in line 7—

Soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Bureau, and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service.

Now, the law has been amended so that people that never dreamed of being in the Army can be treated by the Public Health Service. If the gentleman is not aware of it, I want to both surprise and amaze him.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am not at all amazed or surprised by that, because the functions of the Public Health Service are clearly defined by law. They are obliged to take care of the sick of the Geodetic Survey; they are obliged to take care of the merchant seamen. The gentleman will find on page 3 of our report a summary of their responsibilities:

At the present time the United States Public Health Service stands obliged by law to treat the following cases:
(1) Merchant seamen.
(2) The Mississippi River Commission.
(3) The United States Coast Guard Service.
(4) The United States Lighthouse Service.
(5) The Engineer Corps of the United States Army.
(6) The United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.
(7) Civilian employees injured under the workman's compensation act.
(8) Civilian employees injured on Army transports.

Then was passed the war-risk insurance act of October 6, 1917, which imposed the additional burden of caring for discharged soldiers and sailors. It is a matter of pure conjecture what limits that burden will extend to.

Mr. CANNON. Does that end the list?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That ends the list.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me right there, the Public Health Service was authorized under the law—I called attention to it, and I will hunt it up again——

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman can tell me what it is, and I may admit it.

Mr. CANNON. It is the right of the people of the United States that never dreamed of being in the service, male and female, to be treated for various classes of diseases.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is true; I have the chart here.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman, when he read from the report, had forgotten that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; the gentleman had not forgotten it. I said in the report that the burden put on the Public Health Service was very much enlarged. They have been enlarged right along year after year since the Public Health Service was organized in 1798. Last year the Public Health Service treated 22,419 patients. But whether or not the Public Health Service has other burdens upon it placed there by Congress—the care of the sick and disabled in other departments—there is no gainsaying the fact, no getting away from the fact, that Congress on October 6, 1917, passed the war-risk insurance amendment which puts the burden of caring for all of the war-risk insurance cases on the Public Health Service. Now, let me get at the meat of this matter.

Mr. CANNON. This is the meat; would the gentleman favor an amendment striking out, in lines 7 and 8, the words "and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service"?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; that would be preposterous; that is equivalent to voting to repeal every law that has been passed enlarging the scope of the Public Health Service.

Mr. CANNON. That enables the Public Health Service to treat any man, woman, or child in civil life.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Surely it does, if entitled by existing laws. Now, I decline to yield further.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LAZARO. Did the committee ascertain how many tubercular soldiers and sailors we have?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am coming to that.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. The language in lines 7 and 8, on page 1, mean these others entitled by existing law to treatment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. That is all there is of it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; that is all. You can not undertake to ask Congress to consent to an amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois which will repeal all former provisions of law and take away the functions of the Public Heath Service. Gentlemen are evading the real issue here. The only point at issue in the consideration of this bill is—and I say it with all deference, and I would like the attention of the gentleman from Illinois particularly, because he raised the point—we have nothing to do here with the existing law. The motion to strike out from among the beneficiaries "all other persons in other departments" would not be germane to this bill, because it would be equivalent to the repeal of all existing laws which have added those department beneficiaries to the burdens of the Public Health Service in years past. All we have to do to-day is to consider whether we are going to keep our promise to the soldiers and the sailors who enlisted under our flag for the defense of our Nation in this war. If you do not provide some place for the men to go in this bill you will have to provide for it in another bill.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I think I have failed to make myself understood, or the gentleman is not candid. I say that under the law as it now is, passed without the knowledge of Congress, practically sandwiched in, the Public Health Service can treat any civilian in the United States—man, woman, or child—without regard to whether they ever had any office, civil or military, in the service of the United States, and that would enable them to fill the hospitals and use this $10,000,000 by the simple words "disabled soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service." That covers every man, woman, and child in the United States.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Just a moment; the gentleman has stated that I was lacking in candor.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I said I had failed to make myself understood or the gentleman was lacking in candor.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not think that the gentleman has anything as a basis for the statement; the bill reads "and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service."

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service. Who are entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service?

Mr. CANNON. Any individual——

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; not any individual; only those who are enumerated on page 3 of the majority report.

Mr. CANNON. But we are not going to enact the report, are we? We are going to enact the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. They are not entitled to treatment by virtue of the report or of this proposed law; but they are entitled to treatment by virtue of laws heretofore passed by Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely, and that includes people who have the measles, the smallpox, the influenza, or any other disease.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That does not happen to be so; and even if it were, would the gentleman seek to lessen the benevolence of any governmental function?

Mr. CANNON. If I should vote for that, with that provision in it, then I would vote to put all of the doctors in the United States on the Public Health Service, and I would treat everybody alike.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The proposed bill simply provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to provide immediate additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the care and treatment of discharged and disabled soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service.

Mr. CANNON. It is the last statement to which I object.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Who is entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service? Not everybody. The law has already provided as to who may be beneficiaries of the Public Health Service.

Mr. CANNON. Everybody who is sick.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Not everybody who is sick; only those who come within certain provisions.

Mr. CANNON. Everybody who is sick or helpless from scarlet fever, mumps, or anything else.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am very much interested in having the cooperation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has taken up so much of my time, because I know his fairness and his wisdom and judgment. But if he does not understand now that there is nothing in this bill which adds to the functions of the Public Health Service except the care of wounded soldiers and sailors, then I must give up. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. If this bill was enacted, will the hospitals be utilized for the treatment of soldiers who were injured fighting in France or in Italy?

Mr. GRIFFIN. They surely will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is the gentleman entirely within the facts about that? Is it not true that in the hearings on this bill it was stated by the officials of the Surgeon General's office that they did not intend to discharge soldiers who needed medical or hospital treatment until they were cured and until further necessity for hospital treatment was done away with?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; they said that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And that, consequently, the men who will be treated in these hospitals under the Public Health Service will be those who passed the draft board but who did not pass the examining physicians at the camps, and the other recipients of the bounty in the Public Health Service who are named in the report.

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; that is too hasty a conclusion to draw.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am asking if the testimony does not show that?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am going to answer the gentleman, though I do not want to take up too much time, because this is consuming time, and it interrupts the train of my remarks, which I had hoped to have been able to present to the House in a logical sequence. Answering the gentleman's question, the proof of the pudding is the eating of it. There was something said by a representative of the Surgeon General's office that it is their practice not to discharge men until they have been subjected to a certain course of treatment, but here are the figures contained in a letter addressed to me, dated as short a while ago as January 17, signed by Rupert Blue, the Surgeon General.

Mr. DYER. Surgeon General of what?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Of the Public Health Service.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That letter has been written to you since the time the committee had its hearings on this bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that I have the latest information and statistics on this measure, right down to date. That letter states that 24,500 tubercular patients have been discharged. Twenty-four thousand five hundred tuberculosis patients actually discharged, men with their lungs sloughed away from the gases in France, men with lungs impaired, discharged; and they can no longer be admitted into the Army hospitals. There is no place for them to go except to the Public Health Service.

Mr. DYER. Do they not go to New Mexico?

Mr. GRIFFIN. There is no accommodation for them. The Army itself tells us that it has no accommodation; that it can not treat men after they are discharged from the service. Please let us get this into our heads—that the Army hospitals can not and will not, under the law, treat a man after he has been once discharged and resumes his civilian status. There is the contingency that has been created, created by the Members of this Congress.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I think I want to agree with the gentleman, and I want to help him out, if I may.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. JUUL. If I understand this bill correctly, and I think I do as far as we have gone, it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to provide immediate additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the care and treatment of discharged soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. That is the meat of it.

Now, my distinguished friend from Illinois is apparently worried over this line, "and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service." You are not adding a line of law.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Not a bit.

Mr. JUUL. The existing conditions——

Mr. GRIFFIN. And we are not repealing any law that exists.

Mr. JUUL. All these people who might be covered by lines 7 and 8 in this bill are already covered?

Mr. GRIFFIN. By statutes which have already been passed.

Mr. JUUL. Absolutely.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. And if you were to strike out——

Mr. GRIFFIN. Pardon me, but my time is short and I promised to yield time to other gentlemen. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-five minutes remain to the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. Why, clearly, if we strike this out instead of passing the act, we will be striking out the meat of the other acts.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest that the gentleman finish the reading of Gen. Blue's letter.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, January 17, 1919.

Hon. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GRIFFIN: The following memorandum is submitted, as requested by you, in order to bring figures in your report on H. R. 13026 up to date:

War-risk insurance cases now actually under treatment up to Jan. 15, inclusive	1,724
Soldiers, sailors, and marines discharged up to Jan. 1 because of tuberculosis who are entitled to treatment, when needed, by the War Risk Insurance Bureau under the act of Oct. 6, 1917	24,500
Cases of epilepsy reported up to Dec. 1, 1918	5,220
(Of these 2,200 had been discharged from the Army up to Dec. 1 and 250 were discharged during December. Number reported during December not yet available, but Army is discharging epileptics at rate of about 250 per month.)
Mental cases, including psychoneurosis of all types, reported to Jan. 1, 1919, approximately	50,000
(This includes not only cases already reported to War Risk Bureau, but also those known to exist in the Army, but not yet discharged. All of these, except the incurable insane, a comparatively small percentage of the total, will be ultimately recommended for discharge.)
Total	81,444

As further showing the need for increased hospital facilities you may be interested to know that there were over 71,000 beneficiaries of the service treated in the 22 marine hospitals and 119 relief stations operated during the year 1918. Twenty thousand six hundred and nine of these were treated in hospitals, but only 12,797 could be accommodated in hospitals owned by this service, the remaining 7,812 having been placed in civilian hospitals under contract. The number of beneficiaries of the service treated during 1918 exceeded by more than 7,000 the number treated during 1917.

It has been stated that the policy of the Army is to keep its tuberculosis cases until they are incapable of further improvement. As a matter of fact, of the 1,724 war-risk cases now actually under treatment, 930 are cases of tuberculosis which have been discharged from the Army. The Army has 8 tuberculosis hospitals, and at the present time has over 5,000 tuberculosis patients under treatment. Even though the policy may be to keep cases in the Army until they are arrested or incapable of further improvement by treatment, it is nevertheless a fact that an arrested case is not necessarily a cured case, and is liable to suffer a recurrence of the disease under unfavorable conditions. Therefore, even cases of tuberculosis which are discharged as arrested or not needing further treatment by the Army become potential beneficiaries of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and an increasing number of these will undoubtedly continue to become actual beneficiaries of that bureau and require hospital treatment in the future as they have during the past.

Respectfully,

RUPERT BLUE, Surgeon General.

You will notice that of the 5,220 cases of epilepsy 2,200 had been discharged from the Army up to December 1. Is the gentleman from Illinois listening to that? The 2,200 epileptics were discharged from the Army up to December 1, and 250 approximately were discharged during December. The precise number reported during December is not yet available, but the Army is discharging epileptics at the rate of 250 per month. Then there is another division of men who will be subject to treatment by this Public Health Service, possible potential beneficiaries under this act. Mental cases, including psychoneurosis of all types reported up to January 1, 1919, approximate 50,000. This includes not only cases already reported to the War Risk Bureau, but also those known to exist in the Army and not yet discharged. All of those, except the incurably insane, a comparatively small percentage of the total, will be ultimately recommended for discharge.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the total number, may I ask?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The total number as figured by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service is 81,444.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would rather not, if the gentleman will permit me to go ahead, as my time is short.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will make it very brief, and the gentleman can put it in his speech if he extends it. I would like to know whether he has the fact showing the number of epileptic colonies in the various States and also the number of tuberculosis sanitariums in the various States that might be utilized for this purpose?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; I have not; but I have other figures here more closely related to this bill. I called up the War Risk Bureau on January 22, and I got Col. Banks, Chief of the Medical Division of the War Risk Bureau, on the phone. He told me that the number of applications filed at the War Risk Bureau up to date was 14,200. All of those men are clamoring for treatment—all soldiers or sailors—and the Public Health Service has just 22 hospitals, having a bed capacity of 1,548, to accommodate them. Now, how in God's name are they going to be accommodated?

Mr. BARNHART. How many?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Fourteen thousand two hundred. That these figures contained a modest estimate of the probable number of patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau is shown by the following estimate of discharges from the United States Army for the year 1918 as given to me by Col. Love, of the United States Medical Corps. On January 23 the statement was that the discharges up to December 31, 1918, were for tuberculosis, 17,000; for epilepsy, 3,000; for mental diseases, 10,000; and for miscellaneous disabilities, 70,000, making a total of 100,000 enfeebled and disabled soldiers of the United States Army who are potential beneficiaries of the Public Health Service.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield? I ask just to ascertain what authority Congress has conferred upon the Public Health Service to look after these various classes of people.

Mr. GRIFFIN. To what classes does the gentleman refer?

Mr. GOOD. For instance, the war-risk act provided for disabled soldiers and sailors who were patients of the War Risk Bureau and were to be looked after by the Public Health Service.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The law specifically provides that the Treasury Department, or the United States rather, should look after them. The Treasury Department specifically has the burden. The Public Health Service is merely a bureau of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GOOD. I understand that. Now, what is intended to be embraced in the language in line 7, "and others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service"? What others are entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think I covered that in my answer before. If the gentleman will look at the majority report, he will notice that on page 3 he will find the various departments of the Government that are entitled to treatment under the laws.

Mr. GOOD. I want to ask if, in drawing that report, the committee had before it this express provision of law and if the members of the committee have personally gone into that matter?

Mr. GRIFFIN. They did very thoroughly. Now, gentlemen, I want to lay a few figures before you, so that they will appeal to your imagination, to your vision.

I know that figures and statistics are tiresome. However, do you know what the entire strength of the Regular Army was on November 11, 1918? It was 515,728; the National Guard, 461,048; drafted men, 2,815,000; making a total of 3,791,776. Now, the strength of the Army at the highest point, before deductions were made for casualties, was as follows: Volunteers, 1,167,547; drafted, 2,818,000.

And yet in the presence of those figures the minority report dares say that it is for the care and treatment of the drafted men who never went over on the other side that these additional facilities are required. Where, in the name of Heaven, can they deduce that assumption from anything that was produced before our hearings? We have 2,000,000 boys over on the other side, or we had at the conclusion of hostilities, less the number who offered up their lives or were wounded.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The time is very short. I would prefer that the gentleman hold his question until some of the other Members are speaking.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has made a report that directly relates to the bill, but, if the gentleman wishes, I will not embarrass him.

Mr. GRIFFIN. According to Gen. Pershing, up to November 18, 1918, there were killed in action in the American Expeditionary Forces 36,145. The totals carried up to January 24—that is, yesterday—are: Killed in action, 31,019; died of wounds, 13,572; died of disease, 18,863; died unclassified, 2,705; wounded, 189,955; prisoners, 3,367; missing in action, 14,829.

But I want to emphasize that nearly 190,000 boys were wounded over there on the other side. Have we no vision to see what is going to happen in the future? Can we not see those boys coming back here to this country, hobbling along our streets on crutches, with their pale, wan faces, and clad in their faded coats of khaki, with arms missing, with their lungs polluted by diseases which they contracted in the trenches? And is any man going to say that these men should not have provision made for them?

Now, I take it from the questions that have been asked that the principal embarrassment is that which struck the committee in our hearings, namely, Are there not accommodations enough? Yes; there are accommodations, but those accommodations are for the Army, not for the discharged soldiers. The Army had up to yesterday 42,000 vacant beds, but there are 120,000 wounded boys on the other side who have not yet come over, and they have got to be taken care of.

Now, it was quite evident to our committee that the Army has no facilities to turn over to the Public Health Service.

Mr. DYER. The Army has plenty of funds with which to provide additional hospitals.

Mr. GRIFFIN. They have the funds; but they are not confronted with the burden of responsibility of caring for the discharged soldiers.

Mr. DYER. They are not discharging them. I have received many denials of discharge of those already wounded and crippled.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have read figures showing the number of men that have been discharged.

Mr. DYER. They will not discharge them until they are well.

Mr. GRIFFIN. They have discharged 24,500 patients suffering from tuberculosis and who are not cured. Their condition might have been alleviated; but tuberculosis is not a disease that can be permanently cured. As early as last July, Mr. DeLanoy, the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the pressing need of making some provision for the constantly increasing beneficiaries of the war-risk insurance act. The following is his letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, July 30, 1918.

Subject: Need of enlarged hospital facilities.
The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: 1. I have the honor to invite your attention to the care and treatment of men who have been discharged from the military and naval forces of the United States who are beneficiaries of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and are in immediate need of sanatorium facilities.

2. Under the provisions of the amended act of October 6, 1917, defining the duties of this bureau it is provided in article 3, section 300, paragraph 3, that the sick or injured beneficiaries "shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services and with such supplies, including artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary."

3. Section 303 provided that "as frequently and at such times and places as may be reasonably required, submit himself to examination by a medical officer of the United States or by a duly qualified physician designated or approved by the director."

4. At present the only "governmental" hospital services available for this work are the hospitals and relief stations of the United States Public Health Service, as the hospitals of the Army and Navy can not be used for the treatment of discharged soldiers and sailors under the law, because these men have resumed their civilian status, and for the further reason that these hospitals are entirely occupied with the sick and disabled who are now in active military and naval service. The chief medical advisor of this bureau is now making use of every hospital and relief station of the Public Health Service in all parts of the country, and as this hospitalization of discharged soldiers and sailors is increasing, the necessity of making increased provisions in the hospitals of this service will be more acute when the Army is numerically increased.

5. The great problem connected with this work is the caring for discharged soldiers and sailors suffering from tuberculosis, and as 10,000 have already been discharged and are eligible for compensation and sanatorium treatment, the chief medical advisor informs me that he has already filled the Government sanatorium at Fort Stanton, N. Mex., to its capacity, and that he is finding difficulty in procuring suitable bed space in local hospitals, where the cost of maintaining them is greater than in the Government institutions.

6. The experience of the allied nations should be our guide in making preparation for the cases which will inevitably become a charge upon this bureau in the near future, as both England and France have returned tens of thousands of cases from the front broken down by this disease.

7. It is therefore the desire of this bureau that this condition be represented to the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, directing his attention to the department's needs in this respect, and urging his cooperation in providing sufficient bed space, either by the enlargement of hospitals now existing or the construction of new buildings.

Respectfully, WILLIAM C. DELANOY, Director.

As a result of this initiative, a conference was arranged between the three most interested departments of the Government—the Army, the Navy, and the Public Health Service—and the result of their labors was embraced in the following report:

SEPTEMBER 11, 1918.

Report of the committee appointed by the chairman of the conference of officers of the Army, Navy, and Public Health Service to obtain data regarding the number of men discharged from the military forces, and the percentage of those engaged who will become beneficiaries of the War Risk Insurance Bureau; also to present conclusions, if any could be reached, regarding the accommodations which should be furnished to those patients.

This committee has the honor to make the following report:

The largest number of discharged soldiers requiring treatment will be cases of tuberculosis. Fourteen thousand men have already been discharged from the Army on account of this disease. During the remainder of the calendar year 1918 and during the year 1919 it is estimated that 20,000 men will be rejected on their primary examination at the camps after induction into the service.

The War Risk Insurance Bureau of the Treasury Department would have to care for these patients. From its experience, three-fourths, or about 26,000, will avail themselves of sanatorium treatment.

It is estimated that the average length of time the patients will remain in a tuberculosis sanatorium is six months. Therefore 13,000 beds will be required for these patients.

The number of soldiers that will be discharged from the Army hereafter during the war will be small, as it is the policy of the War Department since May 21, 1918, not to discharge tuberculous soldiers as long as they need sanatorium treatment. Practically the same policy is followed in the Navy Department.

The War and Navy Departments have made no provision for the treatment of patients other than those of the active forces, and therefore no beds are available for patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

The number of soldiers discharged for diseases other than tuberculosis that will require hospital accommodations will probably be small and can be taken care of in existing hospitals.

EARL H. BRUNS,
Lieutenant Colonel,
Medical Corps, United States Army.
W. E. EATON,
Lieutenant Commander,
Medical Corps, United States Army.
W. G. STIMPSON,
Assistant Surgeon General,
United States Public Health Service.

After a careful examination of this report former Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo forwarded the following letter to the Speaker, dated September 20, 1918, in which he submitted a proposed form of bill:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, September 20, 1918.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a tentative draft of legislation, with the request that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for immediate consideration:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to provide immediate additional hospital and sanatorium facilities for the care and treatment of discharged, sick, and disabled soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and for others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service, by lease or purchase of existing plants or the construction of new hospitals and sanatoria, to include the necessary buildings, with their appropriate mechanical equipment and approach work, including roads leading thereto, for the accommodation of patients, officers, nurses, attendants, storage, laundries, and live stock, on sites now owned by the Government, or on new sites to be acquired by purchase or otherwise at such places as he may elect, including the remodeling of such of the existing or authorized buildings and their equipment, owned by the United States, as may be necessary to economically adapt such facilities to those herein provided, at the sanatorium at Fort Stanton, N. Mex., and at such of the marine hospitals where increased facilities can be placed, at a limit of cost for sites and buildings, etc., as aforesaid, complete, of $9,700,000, or as much thereof as may be found necessary; for miscellaneous furniture and equipment for the above, $800,000; in all, $10,500,000, and the above amounts are hereby authorized, and when appropriated to be immediately available and remain available until expended.

"The Secretary of the Treasury, in securing additional sites herein provided for, may request the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, or the Secretary of the Interior to transfer to the Treasury Department such lands or parts of land under their control, not required for other purposes, as may be found suitable for this use, and they are hereby authorized to make such transfer as may be in the interest of the Government.

"In carrying the foregoing authorization into effect, the Secretary of the Treasury may enter into contracts for the lease or purchase of existing buildings, grounds, and equipment, or purchase materials and labor in the open market, or otherwise, and employ laborers and mechanics for the construction of such buildings and their equipment as in his judgment shall best meet the public exigencies, within the limits of this authorization.

"And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to employ, for service within or without the District of Columbia, without regard to civil-service laws, rules, and regulations, and to pay from the sums hereby authorized, at customary rates of compensation, such additional technical and clerical services as may be necessary, exclusively to aid in the preparation of the drawings and specifications for the above-mentioned objects and the supervision of the execution thereof, for traveling expenses, and printing incident thereto, at a total limit of cost for such additional technical and clerical services and traveling expenses, etc., of not exceeding $330,000 of the above-mentioned limit of cost."

Attached hereto are photostatic copies of certain reports and recommendations, which are self-explanatory and show the necessity for the above legislation.

Respectfully, W. G. McADOO, Secretary.

Secretary McAdoo felt that the matter was so urgent that he followed this letter up with another on November 18, 1918, in which he set out the reasons requiring, in his judgment, its immediate passage.

I call your attention specifically to the clause next to the last in which he states that "the War Department is desirous of discharging these cases into the care of the War Risk Insurance Bureau."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.
Washington, November 18, 1918.

The SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Pressing necessity of the utmost gravity impels me to invite your attention to two bills pending in Congress, to supply hospital accommodations for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors, patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and others entitled to treatment by the Public Health Service of this department; namely, H. R. 12917, to provide certain hospital facilities at Dawson Springs, Ky., on land to be donated to the Government, and H. R. 13026, to provide like hospital accommodations at various points throughout the country. The former bill was introduced in the House on September 11, and on investigation by the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee, was reported out, and subsequently made a special rule in Congress, that the greatest possible expedition might be given to the project, and at this writing I understand that the bill is only waiting for a quorum in the House to complete the legislation in that branch of Congress.

In my letter of September 20, transmitting a tentative draft of legislation, which has since been given H. R. 13026, there was also transmitted a report from a committee appointed by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and myself, in which the statement was made that 13,000 beds would be required for these patients, and that the War and Navy Departments had made no provision for patients other than those of active forces, and therefore the War and Navy Departments had no beds available for patients of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and in addition thereto, a memorandum from the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service of this department in which the statement is made that these beds would not be for temporary purposes, but will be needed for years to come, and that the estimated cost of supplying the number of beds required would be $26,000,000 for hospital accommodations for soldiers and sailors suffering from tuberculosis.

In addition to these patients, I am advised in a letter dated October 26, from the chief medical advisor of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, that the Surgeon General of the United States Army had asked for some practical solution for supplying sanatoria for restorative or institutional treatment of persons discharged from the military and naval forces suffering from epilepsy, due to shell shock and other causes. The War Department is desirous of discharging these cases into the care of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. In connection with these cases, it is estimated that accommodations for not less than 2,000 should be immediately provided for out of the funds carried in H. R. 13026.

The bills above referred to represent estimates for approximately 6,000 beds only, but it is of the utmost importance that this number be made available at the earliest possible moment. Since these estimates were transmitted to Congress an armistice has been declared and hostilities ceased, but while these are happy conditions, it has, as a matter of fact, foreshortened the day and hour when hospital accommodations must be made available and has pressed home to me the tremendous responsibility of supplying accommodations for the sick and disabled discharged soldiers and sailors who will soon return from overseas in overwhelming numbers, and I can not too strongly urge upon you to exercise all your influence to translate the proposed legislation into law, as one of the utmost importance, in order that the Government may carry out its part of its contract with the soldiers and sailors who have so magnificently carried out their entire contract with the Government, and to this end request that this legislation be made a special rule in the House in order that funds may be made immediately available for the purpose above stated.

Respectfully,

W. G. McADOO, Secretary.

Upon the receipt of this letter the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds began a very painstaking investigation of the hospital situation in the United States.

I want to say here that in the beginning I think the majority of the committee were against this measure. When we learned that the Army hospitals were not available to discharged soldiers we felt obliged to report this bill.

The minority report contains a table showing the hospitals under the control of the War Department. Permit me to say that this very table, used by the minority, was compiled explicitly at my instance and request. On page 19 of the hearings (No. 16, Dec. 9, 1918) you will find the following in our examination of Col. Winfred H. Smith, United States Medical Corps:

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think it would be well to have Col. Smith have a copy of his testimony which he has given here to-day. The figures and facts which he has given in his testimony are somewhat disconnected.

The CHAIRMAN. He will have a chance to revise his statement.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And I suggest that he recapitulate his testimony; showing the number of hospitals in the United States, the number of hospitals upon leased ground; the number of cantonments; whether the sites at cantonments are on leased ground; the location and the bed capacity of all the hospitals; and also giving the present use of the beds at all the hospitals and the number that are vacant. In short, a summary and recapitulation of all his testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and particularly, I would like the information to come from the War Department proper as to when we can expect, if ever, to get them; because, no matter how well they are suited for the purpose, if we can not get them they are not worth anything to us.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, we can get them by legislation, even if the War Department says they can not give them up; we have authority to do that.

When Col. Smith's recapitulations and tables came in we found that even if we had double the facilities and all were capable of surrender to the Public Health Service, we could not use a single hospital without some specific authority.

We then amended the bill as you will find on page 3, lines 1 to 16, so as to authorize the Public Health Service to negotiate with and procure from the other branches of the Government every hospital facility attainable—and, mark this: We enjoin them not to use a cent of this appropriation until they have acquired every available hospital from the other departments.

The interest of the new Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. Carter Glass, not so long ago one of our most highly esteemed colleagues, is not one whit less than his predecessor. No longer ago than the 16th of January he wrote this letter to the chairman of the Rules Committee, urging a special rule in order to obtain immediate action on this bill:

JANUARY 16, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD W. POU,
Chairman Committee on Rules,
United States House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. POU: I wish to invite your attention to the very urgent need of providing additional hospital facilities for the care and treatment of patients of the Public Health Service and for discharged soldiers and sailors who are beneficiaries of the War Risk Insurance, for which the Treasury Department is charged by law with the responsibility of providing hospital accommodations and treatment.

The present total normal bed capacity of hospitals under the control of this department is but 1,548, while on November 20 there were actually 1,556 patients in its hospitals. Indeed it has been necessary for many months to crowd our hospitals to the limit of their capacity by placing additional beds in undesirable places and to refuse admission to many who are entitled to treatment in our hospitals. This department also has the names and addresses of upwards of 50,000 other cases entitled under law to receive treatment for which there are absolutely no hospital accommodations.

A comprehensive and carefully worked out scheme of additional hospital accommodations, much of which will be of a more permanent nature and affording a permanent groundwork for the hospitalization of persons entitled to treatment by this department, is provided for in a bill which has been given No. H. R. 13026, now awaiting action by the House of Representatives.

It is reasonable to presume from the location of this bill on the House calendar that consideration of it will not be reached for a very considerable time, possibly not this session, and as the most urgent need of these additional accommodations is for the benefit of discharged soldiers and sailors who require and are entitled to hospital treatment, it is of vital interest to every section of the Nation that the Government may be put in position to promptly carry out its contract in this respect, as expressed in the amended act of October 6, 1917, and prior legislation.

May I not suggest and urge that a special rule be brought by your committee for the immediate consideration of this bill as reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds on December 21, a copy of which is hereto attached?

Respectfully, CARTER GLASS, Secretary.

Present and potential beneficiaries of the War Risk Insurance Bureau under act of Oct. 6, 1917.

War-risk insurance cases now actually under treatment, up to Jan. 15, 1919, inclusive	1,724
Soldiers, sailors, and marines discharged up to Jan. 1, 1919, because of tuberculosis	24,500
Cases of epilepsy reported to the United States Army up to Dec. 1, 1918 (up to Jan. 1, 1919, 2,500 cases have been discharged)	5,220
Mental cases, including psychoneurosis of all types, reported in the Army up to Dec. 1, 1918, approximately	50,000
Total	81,444

Applications filed at War Risk Insurance Bureau up to January 22, 1919, inclusive (statement of Col. Banks, chief medical adviser of the War Risk Insurance Bureau), 14,200; and coming in at the rate of 200 per day.

That these figures contain a modest estimate of the probable or potential beneficiaries of the War Risk Insurance Bureau is shown by the following estimate of discharges from the United States Army for the year 1918, as given by Col. Love, United States Medical Corps, on January 23, 1919:

Total discharges to date Dec. 31, 1918 (estimated for 1918).

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman from New York reserve?

The CHAIRMAN. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of regret to me that I shall be compelled to oppose this bill in its present form, because I think I realize full well that there must be some additional hospital facilities in the United States. If it is not possible to secure a better bill, I shall, of course, support this one.

I can see no reason for dividing the hospital organizations of the United States into four or five different sections, so that we will have Army hospitals, Navy hospitals, hospitals under the Board of Managers, hospitals under the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and hospitals under the Public Health Service.

Many men who have discussed these hospital projects bring in statements about the boys coming back in faded khaki, and many other statements that have no bearing on a hospital bill, and I can not but feel that the time has come when sense and not sentiment should govern us, and when either the Cabinet of the United States or its different members, or the War or Navy Department, or some committee, should bring in one definite, concise bill which will take care of all of the veterans of all of the wars of the United States.

This bill, so far as I am able to determine, does not attempt to take care of soldiers or sailors except in its title. The title of the bill says:

To authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospitals and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors.

But the report of the committee refers to merchant seamen, the Mississippi River Commission, the United States Coast Guard Service, the United States Lighthouse Service, the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, civilian employees injured under the workmen's compensation act, civilian employees injured on Army transports, and cases of discharged soldiers and sailors under the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that all the matters mentioned now by the gentleman are in existing law, in another law, and that they are merely in this report to show the kind or classes of men that are now being cared for by this organization; that it is not proposed to enact this into law, but this is merely calling attention to the fact that these classes are being cared for under existing law?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I think that the statement of the gentleman is entirely correct, but the Public Health Service can treat anybody in the United States that they want to treat, and that great class was not mentioned. The statement of the gentleman being true is no reason that we should bring a law before this Congress masquerading as the soldiers' and sailors' law when there is no attempt going to be made to give soldiers and sailors a law, but an attempt is made to take care of another great class of citizens whose cases we can reach later.

Now, I do not think it has been fully brought to the attention of this House that in this bill the plan is to spend $26,000,000, as can be found in the hearings had before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, No. 14, on page 43, where Mr. Perry, the constructing engineer, states:

If you go into a fireproof construction, instead of costing $26,000,000, as this entire 13,000-bed project is estimated, on an economic basis, it would cost something like $125,000,000.

In other words, gentlemen, they expect to expend $26,000,000, through the Public Health Service, to build one-story temporary wooden buildings, as you will find by referring to page 42 of the hearings, where Mr. Perry says—

We are only attempting to put up one-story buildings out of this appropriation, and those will not be necessarily fireproof.

In astonishment and alarm the chairman asked—

One-story buildings?

Mr. BURNETT. Out of the proposed appropriation in this bill?

Mr. PERRY. Yes; all buildings.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the idea of that, Mr. Perry?

Mr. PERRY. A matter of economy. If we had to have a great deal of space for buildings, the economics of going into two-story buildings would seem justified.

My contention is that we should not support this bill, which will involve an expenditure of $26,000,000 for temporary buildings——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for five minutes additional.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. We should ask the Secretary of the Treasury or the Surgeon General or the Cabinet officer whose duty it may be to submit a comprehensive plan for taking care of the soldiers and sailors of all wars.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly, sir.

Mr. TILSON. What does the gentleman say of the method of taking care of discharged soldiers and sailors in this war, in a hospital mixed up with people of all sorts of occupations, mentioned in this report? As is well known, in the case of previous wars—the Civil War and the Spanish-American War—separate homes and hospitals have been erected for discharged soldiers and sailors. What does the gentleman say of this as a satisfactory method of taking care of discharged soldiers and sailors?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It is a pertinent question, but it would be difficult for anyone to answer it without more knowledge of the facts than I claim to have. But I will say that my theory has been that it is necessary to segregate the patients in hospitals in different classes, basing your division, perhaps, on the age of the men, the kind of diseases they have, and taking into consideration all the different things that a doctor could inform you about better than I could.

Now, another reason why I shall feel constrained to oppose this bill is that the Surgeon General will take care of all these patients, if we ask him to do so or give him the opportunity to do so, as you can find by referring to page 9 in No. 16 of the hearings of the committee, where Col. Smith was asked these questions:

Have you any beds that can be turned over?

Col. SMITH. No, sir; not for another department to operate. But if given the necessary authority we could treat in Army hospitals patients sent to those hospitals by the War Risk Bureau, and are willing to do it.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. JUUL. Could the War Department under any law treat discharged sick and disabled soldiers and sailors?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Not under existing law; but instead of building a great big organization out of the Public Health Service, that is going to spend from $26,000,000 to $125,000,000 to put up wooden barracks, it would be better to pass a law giving the Surgeon General the power to treat those patients.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman know how many general hospitals the Army has?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It has only four general hospitals, and the bulk of its hospitals are on leased ground and in leased buildings, hotels all over the country that they are very anxious to get rid of, and barracks in camps soon to be deserted.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. That condition is due largely to the fact that the Surgeon General's office and the War Department have not taken advantage of the situation, as Congress has given to them the means of providing hospitals. If they would do that and not be so sleepy on the job, that condition would not prevail.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I can not understand what the gentleman means. I wish he would be more specific.

Mr. DYER. I say that the War Department has the authority to provide for all the hospitals necessary, and the money has been appropriated.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Only for the care of men in the service.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentlemen have concluded, I want to say that there is no difference of opinion between the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] and myself, so far as we both want hospital facilities to be afforded to the soldiers and sailors, but we disagree only on the broad general scheme. In other words, he evidently desires to have five or six different organizations and I desire simply two, the Army and the Navy.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me a question there?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I disclaim any personal interest in desiring any set of organizations. The Treasury Department has requested this legislation and they have stated the predicament they are in. They find that they can not appeal to the War Department, because the War Department is in no position to care for discharged soldiers and sailors, and the only other organization that is in existence that can take the burden is the Public Health Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I can say to the gentleman that we have a Secretary of War and a Secretary of the Treasury that ought to know the facts with reference to the treatment of these patients. If those two men could not confer together and request this Congress to enact one comprehensive statute, I do not know how it is going to be done.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota five additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will yield for one additional question. My time is very short.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman know that during July of last year there was a conference between Earl H. Bruns, lieutenant colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army; William E. Eaton, lieutenant commander, Medical Corps, United States Navy; and W. D. Stimpson, Assistant Surgeon General United States Public Health Service, and that after conferring as to what should be done to accommodate the patients of the war-risk insurance they made a report September 11, 1918, recommending additional hospital facilities and recommending this very plan?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not know about that conference, because I was unable to attend it, but I know that nobody heard of any comprehensive plan for the building of hospitals, except one or two desultory bills here and there, and one in particular that is objectionable, because it simply spends money in useless organization.

Now, let me call the attention of the gentleman to page 4 of his bill, where it says:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to employ, for service within or without the District of Columbia, without regard to civil-service laws, rules, and regulations, and to pay from the sums hereby authorized, at customary rates of compensation, such additional technical and clerical services as may be necessary, exclusively to aid in the preparation of the drawings and specifications for the above-mentioned objects and the supervision of the execution thereof, for traveling expenses, and printing incident thereto, at a total limit of cost for such additional technical and clerical services and traveling expenses, etc., of not exceeding $330,000 of the above-mentioned limit of cost.

I will say in conclusion that it is time the different departments of the Government got together, recognizing the emergency that we have to meet and submitting to this House one comprehensive permanent building program and not simply submitting of a program which calls for the expenditure of $26,000,000 for barracks, such as we had in the cantonments and temporary buildings.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman has just read the last provision of the bill. Does the gentleman know whether or not the Public Health Service has these plans and specifications, without going to this additional expense?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not know; but I imagine that they have not, because they call for the $330,000.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the reason I asked the question, because my understanding is different from that.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. If they have the plans, they ought not to ask for the $330,000.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Has the committee ever considered the question of giving these disabled soldiers liberal pensions and letting them select their own hospitals? Would we not save millions of dollars by that policy, and would it not be more humane to do that, as we did after our Civil War?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not know as to that. We have passed this insurance act, and it is in force and effect. I imagine that the time to have adopted the program the gentleman suggests would have been at the beginning of the war, before we had such legislation.

Mr. SHERWOOD. These wounded and disabled men are coming over day by day, more and more of them, although three months have passed since the armistice was signed.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes; and there will be many more.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Has the gentleman any idea how many there will be of the inmates of these hospitals?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not know, because no one has been able to get authentic information with reference to the casualty lists.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Has the gentleman any estimate of the cost of these hospitals except what is in the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have not.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, any Member of this House who would vote against the appropriation of every dollar necessary to provide for the health, the comfort, and the needs of the young men of our country who have answered its call in this time of peril ought, I think, to resign and go home in disgrace. But that does not necessarily imply that we ought to plunge blindly into business propositions involving millions of dollars without knowing what we are doing. I am a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and attended the hearings on the Public Health Bureau hospital bill most of the time. I heard the representatives of the War Risk Bureau and of the War Department, and they could not at that time give any estimate whatever of the probable needs. They did, however, give us this much—and that was the 1st of December—the War Department hospital facilities at that time had 76,109 vacant beds and the Public Health Service 14,000 vacant beds, making a total of 90,109 vacant beds. For the month from December to January there was a shrinkage in the number of cases of 2,000, making 92,000 available vacant beds. When asked if they had made any survey as to needs and the possibilities of leasing temporary quarters for these men needing treatment, until it was determined how many of them would need permanent homes or hospitals, they said they had not made any such investigation; and I called attention at that time to the fact that in the State of Indiana, at West Baden, the Government took over the great West Baden Hotel, with a capacity of some 650 beds.

I speak only of the State of Indiana; and beside West Baden, at Winona, Ind., an assembly place known all over the United States, they have enormous housing or hospital facilities. They have large hotels and cottages, steam heat, electric light, and all the facilities of a health resort, and I know the owners are willing to lease it to the Government. I have no doubt that there are places in every State in the Union similar to that that could be utilized. There is another, at Interlarken, Ind., where there are facilities for 500 schoolboys, but the war interfered and the Government took it over as a training school. They would, no doubt, lease this to the Government until such time as the War Department and the War Risk Bureau can ascertain what it needs.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Not just now. This $10,000,000 is to go ahead with an undertaking that we know nothing about. It may take a hundred million dollars to provide enough hospitals, and if it does I think the Congress ought to grant it; but until the War Department and the War Risk Bureau can give to Congress some idea of what it will actually need and some reason for the belief why we need a hundred million dollars for housing facilities for discharged soldiers, I think Congress ought to go slow. It is a business proposition. I think we ought to take care of all disabled soldiers, and we are willing to vote every dollar necessary for that purpose.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am anxious to correct the statement the gentleman has made before he leaves this subject. I want to ask him if he is familiar with the amendment on page 3 of the bill, which the committee introduced for the purpose of enabling the various departments to cooperate and coordinate and enable the Public Health Service to procure hospitals from any other department?

Mr. BARNHART. I am familiar with it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. And it contains a proviso that they shall not spend a cent of this money until they have exhausted all the available hospital facilities in the United States.

Mr. BARNHART. That is not strong enough; there is nothing mandatory about it. The officials of the War Department indicated strongly that they are going to hold all they have, although they had 76,000 vacant hospital beds in the regular Military Establishment. How many men will have to have permanent quarters in hospitals nobody can tell. I believe that it would be good business and humane common sense to defer consideration of a bill like this until such time has arrived that the War Department and War Risk Bureau will have some intelligent information as to what they really need.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is it not also true that these soldiers want immediate care and that these hospitals can not be built in two or three years?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly. They can not build these hospitals on a permanent plan within several years.

Mr. SHERWOOD. And would it not of necessity involve the appointment of thousands of surgeons and nurses to take care of these hospitals?

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, every time you create a new Government function you create a great expense for organization. Every man who has had any experience on the floor of this House knows that every new Government institution or department must have a tremendous managerial expense in order to maintain it.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. I will.

Mr. LONDON. What about the 24,500 men suffering from tuberculosis? They certainly need special treatment in sanitariums specially constructed for them.

Mr. BARNHART. How are you going to take care of them under the provisions of this bill? They need immediate care. If they have to have treatment for tuberculosis in its incipiency, it will not do to wait until the War Risk Bureau can build hospitals for them. We have tuberculosis hospitals in every State in the Union which can be temporarily used for discharged soldiers.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. We have two amendments that we have agreed upon in committee, one referred to by my colleague from New York, directing that the Public Health Service shall take over any building or hospital fit for use for this purpose, and that they shall not expend a single dollar of this appropriation until this is done. Another amendment is that they shall cooperate with any State, municipal, or county institution so as to get immediate relief, and these amendments will be offered at the proper time.

Mr. BARNHART. I understand that. But that has nothing to do with the proposition that they will be authorized to go ahead and spend ten or twenty million dollars, or whatever it may be. That amendment is in compliance with the views of the membership of the committee, who believe that the thing to do is to permit them to go ahead and lease facilities and ask for permanent buildings when they learn what is needed.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Under the present law the Public Health Service is not authorized to take over buildings.

Mr. BARNHART. They can lease the buildings.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The War Department can do it, but the Public Health Service is not authorized to do it.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Did I understand that the War Department has taken possession of French Lick Springs?

Mr. BARNHART. No; they have taken over West Baden Hotel, Ind., and they have also taken over for hospital purposes Fort Benjamin Harrison, at Indianapolis, an Army post. I am informed by my friend from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY] that there are 40 to 60 abandoned Army posts in the United States that have splendid buildings already constructed which could be occupied at a very slight expense for hospital purposes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. And they are not occupied now?

Mr. BARNHART. They are not occupied now. When we asked these officials who came before us if they had made surveys of this situation to see what the facts are as to what we already have, and what we shall probably need, they said, "No." Therefore, I think it would be wise and prudent and businesslike to delay the consideration of this bill until the probable needs and facilities available can be ascertained.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman a half minute more.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman familiar with the work of the War Risk Insurance Bureau?

Mr. BARNHART. No; and I do not think anybody is familiar with the work of the War Risk Bureau. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Does the gentleman feel that by reason of their competency and efficiency they should be the people in the United States who should reorganize and take over and handle the hospital facilities of the United States as provided for in this bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to protest against that question, which contains an implication that there is anything in this bill that is going to give the War Risk Insurance Bureau anything to do with the hospitals. It is the Public Health Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Is it not the program adopted by the War Risk Insurance Bureau at a time when it might have been taking care of allotments and some other things?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; it was adopted by all of the departments cooperating together.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I stand with the majority of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in urging favorable action on the pending measure. I am in accord with the medical head of the Public Health Service, Gen. Blue, charged with the responsibility of caring for the injured and diseased soldiers. Much has been said here and in the public press about the failure of the insurance and allotment division of the War Risk Bureau of the Government, but the very act creating that bureau carries a contract which Congress or the Government made with every soldier who is to be discharged from our Army, and it is binding upon every Member of this House who supported that measure. It passed this body without opposition and, as I remember, by a unanimous vote. There in cold, plain type is the written promise this great Republic made that whenever the director of this bureau found it necessary to provide the means for looking after and treating and caring for these soldiers it was the duty of Congress to enact the necessary legislation. Now, that solemn obligation rests upon the Government.

When was it made? It passed this House and was approved by the President in October, 1917. Every man who went either as a drafted soldier or a volunteer had that pledge, promise, or agreement before him. Are we at this time, in this hour, going to begin the repudiation of the pledges made to our men who helped save this country in the great world war? I put it to the conscience of every Member in this House. It is no answer to say, as the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] says, that there ought to be a consolidation of governmental health activities. We have passed that period. That is not the question at issue here. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] speaks about economy. Mr. Chairman, we will rent the abandoned and unprofitable hotels and summer resorts in Indiana, under the provisions of this bill, if they are up to the requirements of the Department of Public Health. Economy! When the House voted $100,000,000 out of the Treasury to feed the people of Europe, with more than 25,000 of our brave soldiers without hospital facilities, wandering about the country to-day, seeking medical attention. They are entitled to it under the law I have mentioned. There are over 25,000 afflicted with tuberculosis, and the responsible officers of this Government before the committee said they are without hospital facilities, and that Congress must provide the money with which buildings are to be constructed or leased. It is no time for delay or procrastination. There is absolutely no excuse for it. If the pending bill is not perfect, then amend it. This side of the House—the Republican side—has always in the past been the loyal and steadfast friend of the soldiers. It has written its history in the statute books of our Nation for more than a half century in their favor and interest, and it is a glorious record for us to be proud of and to continue.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I think we all want to keep all of our pledges, but if we now have 100,000 beds—and a bed with all it means costs $3,000—that belong to the Government, will we not, utilizing those beds, properly care for the people that the gentleman and I voted to care for?

Mr. AUSTIN. Col. Smith, an able and conscientious official of the Surgeon General's office——

Mr. CANNON. Which Surgeon General's office?

Mr. AUSTIN. I mean of the Public Health Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes more?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, we have very little time, and I will ask my friend from Indiana to yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I yield two minutes to him.

Mr. AUSTIN. The testimony before our committee was that of the 100,000 beds more than 50,000 were occupied, and that the vacant beds were awaiting men from the other side. There are absolutely no vacant beds for these soldiers. These galleries are full of soldiers and they will be in every city and village and hamlet of this land, and their eyes are not only on this Congress to-day, but they will be on Congress in the days to come. They will justly hold us to a strict compliance with our promises. We will not be excused if we neglect them or forget their interest.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Does the gentleman imagine that those soldiers to whom he refers sitting in the galleries desire to be placed in wooden barracks, constructed by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, or in good hospitals?

Mr. AUSTIN. I think these matters Congress can well afford to leave to the trained and experienced men who have been intrusted under the law with handling great problems ever since the creation of this Government. If time is to be saved, and time is absolutely essential in preparing hospitals for returning soldiers who need medical attention, and so forth, we should not delay for the construction of expensive marble, granite, steel, and brick buildings.

We will do the best we can to meet the present emergency, and I believe the officials of this Government, whose hearts, souls, and consciences are in this great work, will meet it to the satisfaction of the American Congress and for the benefit and with the approval of the soldiers and sailors. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARDY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13026 and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the pension bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EDITH CAROW ROOSEVELT.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the House to-day passed a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Roosevelt. There were on the calendar two bills, a House bill and a Senate bill, in identical language. The House passed the House bill. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill, which is No. 181 on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if that is the Roosevelt pension bill on which we just voted?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Would the gentleman be disposed, on Saturday afternoon at half past 3 o'clock, to make a point of no quorum in order to pass the bill, because I really believe it would be unfair to many Members who would vote for it.

Mr. MANN. I certainly would not make the point of no quorum.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, what is the parliamentary effect or object if the request of the gentleman from Illinois be granted?

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary effect of it is to finish up the bill and get rid of it.

Mr. LONDON. To facilitate its passage.

The SPEAKER. Otherwise it would be hung up between the two Houses.

Mr. MANN. It is a courtesy——

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state to the House that the House bill granting a pension to Mrs. Roosevelt was introduced before the Senate bill was introduced and was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and that committee of the House reported that bill out and it was placed on the calendar. In the meantime the Senate bill came to the Committee on Pensions of the House and that committee immediately reported that bill to the House. Both bills are identical in form and both are on the calendar. Of course, it would expedite matters materially if the Senate bill had been taken up instead of the House bill, but inasmuch as the House bill was reported out first, I felt like calling up the House bill. The chairman of the committee has no objection to substituting the Senate bill for the House bill.

Mr. DYER. The bill to which the gentleman refers, the House bill, was introduced in the House prior to the Senate bill?

Mr. KEY of Ohio. The House bill was introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. MANN. I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts has no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to substitute Senate bill No. 5318, to pension Mrs. Roosevelt, for the House bill passed a few hours ago, No. 13879. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the House bill was passed be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the vote by which House bill 13879 was passed shall be reconsidered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. And that that bill should lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the House bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Florida rise?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] have leave to revise and extend his remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be permitted to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to see if we could not meet at 11 o'clock on Monday, and I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow—Sunday—it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE ROBBINS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, for the Pennsylvania delegation it becomes my sad duty to announce the death of our colleague, Hon. EDWARD E. ROBBINS, and in that connection I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read the following resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 519.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. EDWARD EVERETT ROBBINS, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of 34 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

WILLIAM S. VARE, GEORGE S. GRAHAM, J. HAMPTON MOORE, GEORGE W. EDMONDS, PETER E. COSTELLO, GEORGE P. DARROW, THOMAS S. BUTLER, HENRY W. WATSON, WILLIAM W. GRIEST, JOHN R. FARR, THOMAS W. TEMPLETON, ROBERT D. HEATON, ARTHUR G. DEWALT, LOUIS T. MCFADDEN, EDGAR R. KIESS, JOHN V. LESHER, BENJAMIN K. FOCHT, AARON S. KREIDER, JOHN M. ROSE, ANDREW R. BRODBECK, CHARLES H. ROWLAND, BRUCE F. STERLING, HENRY W. TEMPLE, HENRY A. CLARK, HENRY J. STEELE, NATHAN L. STRONG, EARL H. BESHLIN, STEPHEN G. PORTER, M. CLYDE KELLY, JOHN M. MORIN, GUY E. CAMPBELL, THOMAS S. CRAGO, MAHLON M. GARLAND, JOSEPH MCLAUGHLIN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the additional resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Sunday, January 26, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1723); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for rent of buildings for the War Department, for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1724); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HARDY, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. SENATE.

SUNDAY, January 26, 1919.

(Legislative day of Monday, January 20, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR BROUSSARD.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions, which I ask the Secretary to read, and I move their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The resolutions (S. Res. 422) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public service.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, we are assembled to-day to pay respect to the memory of our late colleague and friend, Senator BROUSSARD, who died on the banks of the beautiful Bayou Teche, he loved so well, April 12, 1918.

ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was born on the Marie Louise plantation near New Iberia, La., August 17, 1864, and spent his boyhood in the cypress swamps and on the broad prairies that abound in that section. The country was a veritable paradise of game and fish, and young BROUSSARD was very fond of hunting and fishing. His forbears were among the French colonists of Acadia who were expelled from their Canadian homes by the harsh decree of the British ministry following the peace of Utrecht in 1713, and their tragic fate has been immortalized by Longfellow in Evangeline, wherein he tells how a part of these dispersed people, after many wanderings and sufferings, found a new home in southwest Louisiana. Here they preserved intact for many generations their French language, traditions, and customs, and it was in this atmosphere that ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was reared. French was the universal tongue, and he grew to early maturity without having learned to speak any other language.

He attended the public and private schools of his State, but his father cherishing the hope that his son would adopt the medical profession for a career sent him to Georgetown University, in the Nation's Capital, where he spent three years. Here a new world opened to him. He was a good student and rapidly acquired mastery of English and a sound educational foundation. His youthful imagination was fired by the stirring events that were transpiring at that time, and he determined, against strong paternal opposition, to make law his profession and a public life his career.

His first public office after his return home was that of inspector of customs for the port of New Orleans, from which position he was promoted to assistant weigher, and subsequently to expert statistician. He found time while attending to his duties for the Government to enter the College of Law of Tulane University, in New Orleans, from which he graduated in 1889. He then removed to his boyhood home at New Iberia, where he formed a law partnership with Judge T. Don Foster, brother of United States Senator Murphy J. Foster, under the name of Foster & Broussard, a firm which continued for nearly two decades, and was one of the strongest in southern Louisiana. Had ROBERT BROUSSARD preferred a professional to a political career, high honors in that field and large emoluments undoubtedly would have been his reward.

Mr. BROUSSARD always took an active interest in public affairs and sought to serve his fellow man. He was a natural politician, and his talents as a political organizer and adviser were in constant demand by his party. He served for 25 years as a member of the Democratic State central committee.

When the antilottery question became acute in Louisiana in 1890, and the Democratic Party divided into distinct wings on the issue, ROBERT BROUSSARD took his first independent stand against the State organization. He created for himself a Statewide reputation as a campaigner and stump speaker. The young attorney from New Iberia, hitherto unknown beyond the borders of his district, emerged from the antilottery contest one of the most persuasive orators and astute political leaders in the State. The logical result of this fight was his nomination and election by the antilottery wing to the position of district attorney for the nineteenth judicial district of the State in the campaign of 1892. His record in office, his undoubted strength, and a two-term tradition united in 1894 to obtain for him a unanimous reelection.

Two years later he entered the race for Congress in the old third district. He had a strong opponent, who had the support of the State organization, but BROUSSARD received the nomination. He entered upon his duties in the House of Representatives in the Fifty-fifth Congress March 4, 1897, and served in that body for 18 years, being reelected to eight successive Congresses without opposition, except to the Sixty-second, which came after his election to the Senate. This demonstrates his remarkable personal popularity, and is a record of which the fewest Members of Congress can boast.

When the young Acadian entered Congress conditions in his district were such as to demand his very best study and attention. While the good men in Louisiana had divided on the lottery issue and aligned themselves under the respective banners of Foster and McEnery, another struggle had been going on in Washington which involved the very economic existence of the people of the third congressional district. The cultivation of sugar cane, which since the early thirties of the last century had been the principal vocation of these people, was again suffering from a fierce storm growing out of tariff revision. The McKinley tariff bill, enacted September, 1890, had so far departed from American practice as to place sugar on the free list and give a bounty of 2 cents a pound to the American-grown product in order to stimulate domestic production.

No State in the Union was affected by this revolutionary fiscal procedure so much as Louisiana and property values in the sugar district were shaken to the foundation. A situation developed that called for the exercise of all the legal ability and acumen of the young leader from Iberia, who gave Congressman Andrew Price his hearty support when that gentleman announced his intention to vote against the McKinley bill, notwithstanding its bounty of 2 cents per pound to the Louisiana sugar planters. The bounty yielded a golden harvest while it continued, but it lasted only long enough to reach the Supreme Court, which promptly declared it unconstitutional, with resultant financial chaos in the sugar sections of Louisiana. That condition was very slightly improved, when the Democrats returned to power, by the enactment of the Wilson bill in February, 1894. So heavy a burden was that measure supposed to place upon the Louisiana industry that such stanch Democrats as Meyer, Davey, Price, Boatner, and Robertson all recorded their votes against it in the House.

Before the Louisiana sugar district, which had thus become the football of tariff legislation, was compelled to undergo the rigors of another revision, ill health had laid a heavy hand upon Congressman Price, who had done such yeoman service to preserve the industry. He was compelled to lay down the legislative burden; and, as the very existence of his people was at stake, it was agreed that the gravity of the situation demanded the very best talent the district could afford.

Those were the days of the old-time conventions, and in one of the most spirited and closely contested political fights in the history of the State "BOB" BROUSSARD was selected by a majority of one-half vote to continue the battle so long and brilliantly conducted by the lamented Andrew Price. On entering Congress he proclaimed himself a Democrat of the school of Samuel J. Randall, who was thrice honored by his party with the office of Speaker, notwithstanding that he was a stout advocate of protection. In taking this stand Congressman BROUSSARD had the example and counsel of Senator Samuel D. McEnery, affectionately known as the war horse of Louisiana Democracy, who voted for the Dingley tariff in 1897. And throughout his entire career in the House, and later in the Senate, "BOB" BROUSSARD devoted every energy of his being to watching, safeguarding, and upbuilding the sugar industry of Louisiana and the Nation. By close scrutiny and research he mastered the intricate problems of the vexatious sugar question and became an expert on the subject and a tower of strength during the precarious menacing periods when blows and assaults were directed against that great industry.

Upon an occasion in the Senate similar to this Senator BROUSSARD paid his final tribute to the memory of the late Senator McEnery. Between these two there had always existed a warm and devoted personal friendship, perhaps all the more tender because of the disparity in their ages. Senator BROUSSARD felt that in the counsel and experience of his old friend his own footsteps would be safely guided along the tortuous and uncertain paths of tariff legislation, and as the fierce storm of fractional opposition broke about the heads of both these true sons of Louisiana, because each sought the same solution for this great economic problem, we may assume that Senator BROUSSARD was only expressing what he might hope would be said of his own course when, in eulogizing his departed friend, he said:

> I well recall the conference held by the Louisiana delegation in Senator McEnery's office to determine the course to be pursued by the delegation with respect to the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. The delegation favored it in some particulars and opposed it in others. Senator McEnery at once laid down the rule which he said should be our guidance: Will this bill as a whole benefit or injure Louisiana? He argued pointedly that what benefited the people of Louisiana was paramount. One section, he said, can not be made to suffer unless the entire State suffered likewise. By these rules his conduct as a Senator was always guided, and, occupying that position, he has never been held not to have performed the duties incumbent upon him in a patriotic manner, nor was he ever looked upon with suspicion by his Democratic colleagues in the performance of his duties as he conceived them to be.

Senator BROUSSARD held that under our Constitution, so far as the tariff is concerned, our citizenship might be divided into two broad classes—those who advocate protection and those who advocate a tariff for revenue. The difference between the tariff-for-revenue man and the protectionist, he held, was expressed in percentage; "and if this be true," he asked, "who is to judge when the tariff on a given article is a revenue tariff and when is it a protective tariff?" He answered this query with the statement that "the people of each district must decide for themselves, and the Representative of that district should voice the decision of his constituency; the people of each State should decide for themselves, and the Senator should voice the opinion of his State. This was Senator McEnery's rule and guidance, and his people approved it by reelecting him again and again without opposition." When we think of Senator BROUSSARD'S own career, can we have any doubt that in the thought he has here expressed is to be found the pole star by which his own course was guided?

It will be chiefly because of his unending struggle for the preservation of the cane-sugar industry of Louisiana that his memory will be preserved at the National Capital. Born in the heart of the sugar district and intimately associated with the industry until death placed its withering hand upon him, he was one of its leading champions. No cause ever had a more devoted advocate, nor could it wish for one more able. He knew all the intricacies of the involved sugar question, and his colleagues generally accepted his presentation as correct.

In January, 1912, Mr. BROUSSARD was nominated for the United States Senate for the term beginning March 4, 1915. His constituents, knowing that the seat in the Senate would not be vacant for two years, renominated him for the ninth term in the House of Representatives in November, 1912. This is the only instance in American political history, as far as I can learn, where a man was elected to and served for two years in the House of Representatives after having been elected to the Senate.

Senator BROUSSARD was peculiarly well qualified to represent his State in the Senate. He was a man of great intellect, a trained legislator, a profound lawyer, and an able and skillful debater. In the United States Senate, as well as in the House of Representatives, he was recognized as a fearless champion of every interest of Louisiana.

On January 12, 1898, Mr. BROUSSARD married Miss Marrette Applegate, of New Orleans, a lovely and accomplished woman, who survives him. They had no children.

He was extremely fond of flowers, plants, and trees. He paid frequent visits to the Botanic Garden in this city, claiming that it rested his mind and body to look at and study "plants that God put on this earth for our benefit as well as our pleasure." On one occasion, while admiring some orchids, in company with his particular friend, George W. Hess, superintendent of the United States Botanic Garden, he placed his hands upon one of them and fondled it, saying, "To my mind, there is nothing more beautiful in this world than a baby and a flower." He said of trees, "To love trees intelligently we must know them; we must be able to call them by name whenever and wherever we meet them; this is fundamental to any friendship."

Senator BROUSSARD indorsed heartily the sentiment expressed in Joyce Kilmer's exquisite poem on trees:

> I think that I shall never see
> A poem lovely as a tree.
>
> A tree whose hungry mouth is prest
> Against the earth's sweet flowing breast;
>
> A tree that looks at God all day
> And lifts her leafy arms to pray;
>
> A tree that may in summer wear
> A nest of robins in her hair;
>
> Upon whose bosom snow has lain,
> Who intimately lives with rain.
>
> Poems are made by fools like me,
> But only God can make a tree.

Senator BROUSSARD, better known as "BOB" BROUSSARD and "Cousin Bob," had multitudes of friends. He had a charming personality, and affection for him was widespread and deep. To few men is it given to possess the happy faculty of making friends and holding them as did "BOB" BROUSSARD. He was a magnetic orator both in French and English. I once heard him deliver a political speech in English for 30 minutes to an audience composed mainly of French-speaking people, and then, without pausing, he changed to French, amid the wild enthusiasm of his hearers. I did not understand the French portion of his address, but my attention was held by his graceful versatility and charm of manner.

Although in failing health for two years prior to his untimely death, Senator BROUSSARD was cheerful and hopeful to the end, carrying sunshine and good cheer wherever he went. He loved life and enjoyed it to the fullest.

Louisianians were proud of Senator BROUSSARD, loved him in life, and now revere his memory. His work is done; he is at rest; peace to his ashes.

> There is no death! The stars go down
> To rise upon some fairer shore,
> And bright in heaven's jeweled crown
> They shine forevermore.
> There is no death! The leaves may fall,
> The flowers may fade and pass away.
> They only wait through wintry hours
> The coming of the May.
>
> There is no death! An angel form
> Walks o'er the earth with silent tread;
> He bears our best-beloved things away,
> And then—we call them dead.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, my intimate acquaintance with the late Senator BROUSSARD began when I was elected to the Senate in 1909. I knew of him, however, through the fact of his copartnership with a very distinguished and very much-loved classmate of mine at Washington and Lee University. So, without having known Senator BROUSSARD intimately, I knew from the reports that had come to me from his old friends and associates that, like the people of Louisiana, those of us who were to come into intimate contact and touch with him would love him. It did not take long to get acquainted with him, I found, and almost intuitively one was tempted to speak of him as he was lovingly spoken of amongst his friends in Louisiana, as "Cousin Bob," or simply as "Bob," because he at once removed the barrier that might ordinarily be raised between men who meet merely as strangers.

I served on a number of committees with him here in the Senate, and, as has been so ably said by his distinguished colleague [Mr. RANSDELL], whatever duty he turned his attention to he gave it that zealous application and consideration which every intelligent legislator tries to give as the most important part of his legislative duty. He attended committee meetings promptly and gave to the work before the committees, and particularly to that portion of the work that affected his own State, the utmost zeal, application, and effort.

He was a typical southern gentleman, Mr. President, and wore his heart upon his sleeve. I do not know any one of my acquaintances who so represented as did Senator BROUSSARD that affable, courteous, chivalrous disposition which is so characteristic of the old southern gentleman.

We shall all miss him here, Mr. President, as I know that his constituents and friends in Louisiana will miss him, and it will be a long time before his place can be filled here, either as a faithful public servant or in the hearts of his colleagues.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, before coming over to the Senate Chamber this morning I picked up a Congressional Directory of January, 1916. I looked over the list of Senators who had departed from this earth since that time, and I found that 15 Senators while serving in the Senate had died. While talking with one of the Members of the Senate not long ago he told me that in the eight years he had been here he had kept account of the Senators who had died in office and those who had died who had been Senators for a portion of the time during which he had served, and that there had departed from this life 53 of those Senators who had served with him some portion of the time in that period. So we may truly say that "While in life we are in the midst of death."

Mr. President, I was a Member of the House of Representatives when Mr. BROUSSARD was first elected to that body. He was elected in the memorable campaign of 1896. That campaign was, perhaps, the most remarkable that ever took place in the history of the United States. It was because of the fact that there had been such differences of opinion concerning economic questions that parties were almost wiped out of existence. In some States the result was favorable to one political party by enormous majorities, and in other States to the opposite political party.

For instance, in my own State of Colorado, which had been a Republican State up to that time, 85 per cent of the Republicans of the State voted the Democratic ticket, giving Mr. Bryan a majority of 134,000, while upon the other hand New Jersey, that had been a Democratic State for many years, as was the case in some other States in other parts of the Republic, returned to Congress a solid Republican delegation. People had differed very materially upon the money question, and there were grounds for such differences of opinion.

That was a campaign where all meetings were largely attended. There had been a depression in prices existing over the world for many years. It so happened that, according to statistical tables, falling prices had begun about the year that Germany demonetized silver, and from that time until 1896 there had been a continual fall in the level of prices. That was attributed by many, and especially by the Democratic Party, as announced in its platform of 1896, to be due to the fact that the burdens of commerce and credit which previously had been borne by both silver and gold had been shifted to gold alone, thereby increasing the demand for and value of gold, which increased its purchasing power and thus produced falling prices.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that theory was correct. I am a firm believer and have always been a believer in the quantitative theory of money. While we may deplore the high prices which now exist in the United States, their effect in the production of misery and distress is inconsequential if compared with those which would be produced by falling prices.

It was in 1896 that the low level of prices was reached in the United States. It was then that cotton sold for 6 cents a pound; it was then that corn sold for 10 cents a bushel, and in some portions of the Western States it was burned instead of being consumed as food, it being so cheap that it was thought to be more valuable for fuel than for food. It was then, Mr. President, that the conditions grew which culminated in the great change in the Democratic Party.

Mr. Cleveland had espoused the gold standard. There had been produced such a profound change in the Democratic Party that he, although the President of the United States, and made so by Democratic votes, would not support the candidate nominated in Chicago and the principles announced in the platform of that party. It was through his influence that a new ticket was placed in the field, called the Palmer and Buckner ticket. That ticket gained very little support in the Western States; it gained some support in the Eastern States; but the man who made up his mind to vote in that campaign wanted his vote to count, and, consequently, he voted either the Democratic or the Republican ticket.

Mr. President, there have been many theories as to what produced the upward tendency in prices after that time, but no one has ever answered the arguments for bimetalism. It is the theory of many of us that that upward tendency was caused by the increased production of gold. My State, a silver-producing State, came to be a gold-producing State; a great quantity of gold was discovered in the Cripple Creek district, and its product of $300,000,000 of that metal is one of the evidences of the increased gold supply.

Mr. President, it was at this time that Mr. BROUSSARD entered public life. He was thoroughly in sympathy with the Democratic Party and its principles enunciated in the platform of 1896. I remember very well when he first came to the House of Representatives. He was a very young man, being only 33 years of age. He was active, quick, and vigilant, keen of mind, and was considered one of the very young and promising Members of the House of Representatives. Of course, he was always loyal to the interests of his State. Whenever its interests departed from that of the Nation's, he thought that he should espouse the cause of his own State. He wanted to represent his people.

He lived in one of the richest portions of the United States. I do not believe there are any lands in the world that are superior to the lands down on the Gulf coast, and it is no wonder that he felt in recent years that the great sugar interests of Louisiana would be benefited by a duty upon sugar. During the last six years he devoted a great deal of time and attention to preserving that which he thought was absolutely essential to the life and to the growth of the great industry in his State.

Mr. President, my acquaintance with Mr. BROUSSARD ripened into warm friendship as the years passed by. I served in the House of Representatives with him for eight years, and when he came to the Senate I knew him intimately and well. He was a man of the highest honor, one who could always be relied upon, without any suspicion of corruption or improper motive in the vote that he cast. He has left a great name in the State of Louisiana where he was recognized as one of its great leaders. The friends he made were legion. I feel that in his death the Senate has lost a very distinguished Senator, and the Members of the Senate a very lovable companion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I deeply regret the necessity for this memorial occasion. It is always discomforting for me to contemplate death under any circumstances, and especially that of a friend. It is a solemn mystery, and yet no more mysterious than is life. We are forced to speculate on those two phenomena, and out of the speculation are born theories of religion and hopes of immortality. We call life real; and when we see it suddenly terminate, we wonder about the great change and philosophize about the unknowable. From the time of the death of the first man until this hour men and women have stood mute and helpless in the presence of mortality. All hatred, jealousy, and personal animosity are subdued beside the bier; but, except for philosophy, the mourners can not be comforted.

The news of a friend's death comes with a shock. It notifies us of the end of all human association and of all opportunity to do for that friend the things that we would now like to do. It, however, has one benign result, it causes us to pause and indulge in thoughts of life and duty.

I know that these memorial occasions in memory of our one-time colleagues are of no value to the departed. They have passed beyond the realm of censure or praise. Their bereaved families may be comforted by kind words of Senators, but the greatest good comes to those few who participate. It is not well that death should bring a permanent sadness to the friends of the deceased, but it is of the highest importance that men and women should pause in the struggle of selfish, sensual life, with all of its unrealities, to consider seriously the end of it all. We know in our thoughtful, peaceful moments that the only things worth while in life here are the hopes that we are doing something worth while in the world and the respect and friendship of our colleagues. The former may always be shrouded in doubt, but we can feel and know the latter. How miserable we all would be if it were not for our real friends, and yet how often do we sorely test them.

ROBERT—lovingly his friends called him "Bob"—BROUSSARD possessed in a marked degree the true qualities of friendship, and I am thankful that he numbered me among his friends, as I did him among mine. He was a Member of the House of Representatives when I entered that body, and I soon thereafter became acquainted with him. He was a quiet, unobtrusive man, but possessed of the genius of industry in behalf of his constituents, and few Members accomplished more for his people. He knew the needs of his district and State and never neglected them.

I knew little of his domestic relations, as social intercourse in our public life is circumscribed by accidental circles of limited circumference. I knew nothing about his life prior to my coming to Congress and I have not taken the pains to look up his biography. I simply knew him as the man in Congress, and that knowledge warrants me in saying that he was above the average of his colleagues in effective accomplishments. He believed, as did many of his Louisiana colleagues, that the tariff was a local issue. He knew that a protective tariff was necessary to the maintenance of his State, and he had the courage of his convictions. He was never a trimmer, but bold and outspoken in his advocacy of his convictions. He was friendly always. His political word was as good as his bond. His State and the Congress have lost in his death a most valuable legislator.

We can not understand the Providence which called him from great usefulness in the midst of his first term in the Senate, but we know that a good and wise legislator has gone out from among us. I sincerely regret his untimely death.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I feel that I should speak a few words on this occasion in memory of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, native son of Louisiana, who is departed. He long and faithfully represented in the council halls of the Nation that great State. But I am not come to talk of his achievements in forum and in court that brought him, the leader and servant of his people, from his far-off home to the council halls of the Nation. I am not come to talk of his achievements while he stood in the Congress halls and represented his own people and the people of these United States. That can better be done, and has been well done, by his colleague and by his successor. I am not going to specify the different things of benefit that he was able to accomplish here. It is not fitting that I should do so. It will suffice to say that he was a man of fine intellect, character, and ability, a man of fine and true conviction, innate conviction of right, a man who believed in his country. He loved his far-off home in the Southland. He loved the State of his birth. He loved the Nation that he served so well. His patriotism was as broad as the confines of the Nation and as lofty as its greatest purposes, and he yearned for the realization of its highest ideals. Such was the man. He was an honor to his district, to his home, to his State, and to his Nation—to the old South and the new South and the great Nation.

But of that I shall not speak further. I met him first when I came to the Senate, just when the war clouds were lowering and had burst across the Old World and were threatening this land of ours. I was attracted to him because of his charming personality, and because we had some tasks and things in common; and I shall talk chiefly of another side, the human side, of the character of this man.

He loved fair dealing, the open freedom, and the light. He hated darkness and sham and hypocrisy. He loved great nature, her forests and streams, her fields and flowers, the firmament that shows the handiwork of God. He loved the finer things of life. He loved the beautiful and true, poetry and music, and I believe he heard the music of the spheres, and certainly understood the song of the angels, "Peace on earth, good will to men." He loved the grand old masters. He loved the bards sublime. These finer things of life appealed to him and were enjoyed by him. He was also an ardent, a true sportsman, that believed in giving his quarry a fair and even chance. He loved to look upon the faces of kindred spirits in the campfire's glow, in the haunts of the denizens of the wild. His pulses thrilled and his blood leaped at the sound of the chase and sight of the quarry, at the sight and feel of the bending rod, the humming reel, the swirling waters, and the leaping bass.

He was a true sportsman, and I liked him well on that account, my taste for recreation and diversion running along in that line. Personally he was a most charming man. I loved the man. He inspired friendship in others, being himself a stanch friend. His friends to him were right always, loyal and true, and no service he could render them was ever difficult or irksome. But no more will we feel the hearty hand clasp, no more will we enjoy the genial smile of BOB BROUSSARD. He is gone, and there was no more fitting end to a life, I think, than to that of this man.

I stood at his grave side yonder in the Southland. I saw the people, the rich and the poor, the proud and the humble, the lowly and the great, from his town and from the State and all the countryside gathered there about his body in the open. I saw them come to pay tribute to his memory for the last time, and I was glad to be there with them. It was an occasion of genuine grief and mourning. The common people were his friends, and they loved him. They so regarded and affectionately spoke of him as "BOB" BROUSSARD; and there in the sunshine and among the flowers, surrounded by a host of friends whom he served loyally and well, he was laid to rest.

He lived his life not for himself alone, and at the balance must be set down as one who loved his fellow men. He loved his neighbor as himself. He was the friend of man.

"Died," ROBERT BROUSSARD,
And until the future dares forget the past,
His fate and fame shall be
An echo and a light unto eternity.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it is a peculiarity of republican government that men are controlled by their affections rather than by force. I have been very much interested in noting, in the addresses to which we have just listened, the repeated testimony of those most intimately acquainted with the bright and shining spirit who has passed from among us to that quality of Senator BROUSSARD which excited the affection of his associates and of his people.

It is not my purpose to undertake on this occasion to perform the duty, however pleasant it would be, a duty which has already been so well performed in part by his eminent colleague who now occupies the chair [Mr. RANSDELL in the chair], and no doubt will be performed more elaborately hereafter—to compile or to express the story of his achievements, to make a digest of the accomplishments which he was able to bestow upon the people whom he served as a public official; but rather it is by appearing here in person and saying a brief word as the expression in part of the sentiment which I feel as it were to lay upon the grave of Senator BROUSSARD, if I could have the sweet privilege of doing so, one of the beautiful flowers which the speaker this morning said that he loved so well. It is not in what we say upon an occasion like this that we do honor to our friends, but it is in what we feel.

It was my privilege and good fortune to have served in the House of Representatives with "BOB" BROUSSARD, to have been a member of active committees, in the Senate, of which he was a member, to have known him to some extent in a personal and social way, to have met his family. I have as one of my friends a constituent in my home town who formerly came from Louisiana and was an old and intimate friend of the late Senator BROUSSARD and who on many occasions has spoken to me in a feeling way of the qualities of manhood and friendship of our deceased brother.

Senator BROUSSARD's interests, although particularly exercised in the care of his own people, although his energies were concentrated upon the service of his constituents of Louisiana and in the solution of the economic and the governmental problems that were peculiar to that State, were not circumscribed by the boundaries of Louisiana. There is a difference in public men in that respect. Some have but little interest or but little concern for anything in the range of congressional activity that does not immediately and peculiarly concern their own State. Some are inclined to consider their duties and obligations as limited to securing and holding the approval of those to whose vote they owe the position which they occupy. Senator BROUSSARD took a broader view of his functions as a Senator of the United States, and while he rendered adequate and more than adequate service to the people whom he specially represented, yet also he served the Nation well.

I have been informed and instructed by my associations with Senator BROUSSARD as to the great international interests and possibilities of foreign trade and commercial exchange—the relations which this Nation ought to occupy toward the Latin-American Republics, which are near neighbors of the State of Louisiana; and I found that he was a man of vision and of sense, who could appreciate the developments of the future from which the country, and the State of Louisiana among the rest, would profit in due time if we availed ourselves of our opportunities in that regard. I spoke of him a moment ago as a bright and shining spirit. Those words came to my mind and to my lips on the moment as expressing what perhaps was his chief characteristic. He was a man who, immediately upon acquaintance with him, aroused the affections of those whose own natures were so properly and normally adjusted as to respond to contact with merit. I have a picture of him in my mind, from a mere casual circumstance, with no particular reason why it should remain there other than the force of the man himself—of Senator BROUSSARD delivering an address in the House of Representatives. I do not even remember now the subject of his address, but I remember the man. There was a deep and lasting impression left upon me by the conviction which I formed at the time of his character, of his courage, of his pertinacity, of his intellectual brightness, of his deep interest, of his sound policy, of his sincerity. There are but few men who have that indefinable capacity of so fastening themselves upon the memory of those with whom they come in contact.

Senator BROUSSARD had to a pronounced degree that quality. If I had never seen him again, if I had never renewed my acquaintance with him under more intimate circumstances in the work in the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, of which he was a member, and which considered many important questions to which he gave the benefit of his peculiar information and deep interest, if I had never had the privilege of meeting him in a social capacity or of serving with him as a colleague in this Chamber, I yet would have remembered him, as standing out distinctly among all the strange figures who appeared in that numerous legislative assembly, by the one occasion of which I have spoken.

Mr. President, I formed from these associations a sincere attachment for our late colleague. I believe that those who fully appreciate the nature, the true functions of public office in this country, understand that it is not its dignity that constitutes the worth of office, it is not the honor that comes from it, it is certainly not in pecuniary rewards—because they are small, small in comparison with those in other countries of equal power and wealth—but the true worth of public office is in the fact that the subject with which we deal is man himself; that the material with which we work in our everyday task is our fellow man; that we have in our care and under the control and direction of the functions of this great office, for better or for worse, for good or for ill, the destinies of the human race.

I have sometimes wondered as to the exact significance of the saying of the great Teacher of the Christian religion to the poor fishermen at the Sea of Galilee, when he called them around him from the sordidness of their occupation and said to them: "I will make you fishers of men." I have some slight conception of what it meant, and I have felt that if there is a true worth in public office there is something of that nature in it, that there is at least an opportunity for a public man in a position of power, under our Government, to use that power to be a "fisher of men," to save men from the evils which constantly pursue them, to protect them, to put them in such a way that they may guard themselves from that principle of destruction which is constantly attacking the rival forces of virtue.

Senator BROUSSARD conceived, at least as demonstrated by his performance, that characteristic of the position which he filled. He was a fisher of men. He was bound to the men whom he served by the ties of his heartstrings. There was no demand which could be made upon him for service, even though it called for the supreme sacrifice, that he was not ready to deliver.

Mr. President, I consider it a privilege and an honor on this occasion to pay this brief tribute to his memory.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the friendships between men—how they arise, how strong they become, their extent and lasting qualities—are in a measure hardly capable of analysis and sometimes rest almost entirely in the particular personality of the individuals.

I had not even the pleasure of a slight acquaintance with Senator BROUSSARD until he had spent many useful years of his life in serving the people of his State and country. When I met him first, as I believe all men were, I was attracted to him, and as our acquaintance ripened into friendship I knew I was honored by the regard of another man in public life who was worth while.

Those who knew him a longer time and served with him before failing health had come to indicate the termination of his useful labors in the public service are much more capable than I of speaking regarding his public services. It was after he came into this body that there grew up between us a friendly intimacy which I prized, and which I know was agreeable to him, that I came to appreciate his uncommon ability, his high conception of public duty, and his attachment to those he liked. I do not know of any man whose friendship has been more pleasant and grateful, with whom association has given more satisfaction, and whose good opinion I cherished more than that of BOB BROUSSARD.

No man could be brought into association with him and admitted to his friendship without feeling as I did the privilege that one had in this association. No one is grieved more sincerely than his colleagues in this body who knew him well, and the better they knew him the more they have been affected by his death.

His continued illness brought every day from among his colleagues affectionate inquiries as to his condition, and universal regret is the manifestation here of the high regard in which he was held.

Other men have served longer in this body, other men have had greater opportunities to distinguish themselves here in the country's service than he, but no one has deserved and held a higher place in our affections and esteem. No one has more fully lived up to the ethics which prevail here as to the relations of Senators than our friend Senator BROUSSARD, in whose honor we have come together to-day, and to perpetuate whose memory and high service these exercises are now held.

I shall not attempt to review his eminent public service or to relate the many interesting episodes of his career. It satisfies me to record here in few words the tribute of a friend who loved and mourns him.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was born on his father's plantation, in the center of the section so beautifully described by Longfellow—

> Beautiful is the land, with its prairies and forests of fruit trees;
> Under the feet a garden of flowers, and the bluest of heavens
> Bending above, and resting its dome on the walls of the forest.

They who have dwelt there for generations have named it the Eden of Louisiana.

The people who inhabited this lovely section of Louisiana were the descendants of that hardy race who had carved homes from the wilderness and rigors of climate on the shores of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and had by the fortunes of war been transferred without their consent to the British Government by the treaty of Utrecht.

They refused to take the oath of allegiance to the British Crown, and refused to serve in the British armies against their beloved France. They were compelled to give up their homes, and thousands, after enduring untold hardships from disease and want, settled in a body in what was then French territory—Louisiana.

Their loyalty and affection for the customs, traditions, and language of France have been the distinguishing characteristic of these people for more than a hundred years. And yet to-day no community in this broad land is more distinctively American in all that the word "American" stands for.

Young BROUSSARD was educated at Georgetown and Tulane Universities.

He began the practice of law at New Iberia, La.

He began his public career a few years later when the State was in the throes of the fiercest and bitterest contest ever had before or since—the struggle to eliminate the Louisiana State Lottery Co. and destroy that baneful influence on the moral and political life of the State and Nation.

This powerful corporation, with its immense wealth, was seeking a renewal for 25 years of its exclusive State charter. Through its great wealth, gathered from every hamlet in the Union, it had for years maintained a powerful lobby at the sessions of the State Legislature, and exerted a controlling influence on legislation and on State and municipal elections, depending on special privileges to protect monopoly at the expense of the people and retain its servile henchman in public places.

The long career of this institution, reaping a rich money harvest from every nook and corner of the Union, its tempting bait to provide millions for public improvements, hospitals, and education, had produced in the public mind a condition so aptly described by the poet Pope:

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As to be hated needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

The battle was not a political or party contest. It was a fight for civic righteousness, or government by the people, freed from the demoralizing influences which wrecked character and brought misery and crime in its wake.

Money, political, and business influences were freely promised, and more than three million were expended in that campaign. Success for the lottery company meant financial and political advancement for those who marched under its banner. It had a full treasury to pay its champions on the platform and the press.

Its glittering promises to furnish large funds to build levees and prevent the frequently recurring destructive overflows of the Mississippi, which meant ruin to so many, to equip hospitals for the care of the unfortunate, reduce the State debt, and assist in the education of the people formed a persuasive argument with many and quieted the consciences of others.

Mr. President, ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was then district attorney of his district. He could easily have trimmed his course to have kept fair weather and antagonized neither party to the fight. But with the unflinching courage which characterized his life to the hour of his death he promptly enlisted under the banner of sound government, which demands public morality. He appealed to the conscience of the people against the alluring temptations to secure great public benefits from the earnings of an institution, clothed with the sanction of law, in its continued debauchery of the public service and its continued poisoning of the moral atmosphere by its insidious appeal to the gambling instincts so common to man's nature.

ROBERT F. BROUSSARD had no incentive to engage in this great contest but the call of duty to God and country.

With clearness of vision he saw the danger to the generations to come in the menace to the moral, social, and political welfare of the people and the State. He felt that it was a fruitful source of poverty, a seed bed of embezzlement, born of the frenzied desire to possess without the burden of toil.

From every platform he set before the voters that sound government could not be had except from the regular taxes paid by freemen, rather than from a corrupting institution, which, in the name of the State, enriched itself by the impoverishment of the many and made the State its pensioner.

The fight ended in the triumph of the cause of good government and forever destroyed the privilege of gambling for a consideration paid into the public treasury.

He became a candidate for Congress in 1897, in a convention which was in consecutive session many days, and was finally nominated by the fourth of a vote.

He succeeded the distinguished Andrew Price, who after several terms in Congress retired to private life, having served since the death of his father-in-law, Edward James Gay, my grandfather, whose name I am, indeed, proud to bear.

BOB BROUSSARD was returned for nine terms without opposition in his own party and but once by a Republican.

He enjoyed the unique distinction of serving a full term in the House after his election to the Senate. By the constitutional enactment of the State his election took place two years prior to the beginning of his term as a Senator.

The people of his district insisting that they could not spare his services in the Halls of Congress, elected him to the House after his election to the Senate.

Thoroughly informed in the detail of the mechanism of every department of the Government, the cause of every constituent, no matter how slight, received his persistent and indefatigable service. No red-tape machinery could bar the way to a proper adjustment. With infinite tact, unfailing patience, good humor, and sound judgment he pursued the most obdurate of departmental officials, and he rarely failed to move the most persistent objector.

Having patiently and industriously examined a matter and satisfied himself of its justice, he knew no such word as "fail."

The ardor of youth, strengthened by mature judgment and knowledge gained by advancing years, rendered him an expert in matters of legislation as well as in the routine of the departments; hence he was unusually successful before the departments, which learned to value his careful analysis of the matters presented and the perfect fairness with which he stated the question. All appreciated the never-failing energy with which he pursued the subject to a proper conclusion.

Loyalty to his constituents was the inspiration which prompted every act and vote in the long service in Congress of our departed friend.

The production of sugar cane was the prevailing industry of that splendid, fertile section, the third congressional district of Louisiana. The welfare of its population was unquestionably dependent upon its success and the price at which it was sold. An intelligent and energetic and industrious people had built up this great industry in competition with the cheap labor and better climatic conditions of Cuba. It was the constant subject of national legislation, probably more so than any other product of field, mine, or factory—an easy source of revenue, and in the judgment of many political economists it forms an ideal tax by reason of its universal use, and therefore it forms an equitable tax on all the people.

Congressman BROUSSARD had from the beginning of his life, in season and out, made a thorough study of sugar production and its cost in labor and capital. He knew the world's supply and what competition menaced the successful prosecution of this industry in the United States.

The great war just concluded shows conclusively that it is an essential requisite for the proper maintenance of the armies in the field, the toilers in the rear, and is a common necessity in the hovel of the poor and the palace of the great.

So intimately is the welfare of the sugar industry blended with the prosperity of the State of Louisiana that her representatives in Congress for the last 40 years have frequently voted against their political party affiliations on tariff bills by reason of what appeared to them a hostile attitude on the part of the Democratic Party to this great economic interest of their State.

Senators Eustis and Gibson voted against the Mills bill, a Democratic measure.

The McKinley bill provided a bounty for sugar production. The sugar planters regarded the bill as hostile and dangerous to sugar production, and the congressional delegation either voted against the bill or abstained from voting.

On the Wilson bill, a Democratic measure, a majority of the Louisiana delegation in the House voted against it.

On the Dingley bill, a Republican tariff measure, the delegation divided equally in House and Senate.

On the Payne bill, a Republican tariff bill, there was again an equal division of the votes in the House and Senate delegation of the State.

From the inception of his career in the House of Representatives Senator BROUSSARD adopted as the guiding principle for every vote he cast a rule so well stated by Louisiana's "grand old man," Senator McEnery, who held the confidence and affection of his associates in this body, regardless of party affiliations.

Speaking to the Louisiana delegation at a meeting held for the purpose of determining the vote of the Representatives of the State in Congress on the Payne bill, Senator McEnery said: "The rule that should guide us is, Will this bill, as a whole, benefit or injure Louisiana? What benefits the people of the State should be paramount."

Senator BROUSSARD always had this rule as his guide during his entire service in the House.

Criticism by the press of the State or by party associates never moved him to abandon this guiding principle. Party caucuses in Washington failed to bind him, although failure to obey the caucus mandate meant disloyalty to the party organization and brought him in direct conflict with the leaders of the Democratic Party in and out of Congress. With unflinching courage he stood alone in defiance of the caucus, accepted the humiliation of removal from the most powerful committee—the Ways and Means—on which he had earned a place by reason of long service coupled with exceptional ability and expert knowledge on tariffs.

In a memorial address on the life and character of Senator S. D. McEnery, on February 26, 1911, Senator BROUSSARD expressed his convictions on the duty of a Representative of the people in Congress, defining, according to his conception, the duty to party and the broader duty to the people he represented. He said:

> Fundamentally speaking, the Democratic Party is built upon the idea of individual liberty in its broadest sense and scope within the limitations fixed by the Federal Constitution. That scope essentially includes the principles of self-government; that scope includes State sovereignty, which is the broader expression of local self-government, and essentially contemplates that the Representative, if he be a Member of the House, should receive his primary instructions from his constituency composing his district. And the Senator representing a sovereign State should receive primarily his instructions from the people of his State. * * * The Congressman—and I use the word in its true sense—is but the agent of the people who, or the State which, sends him here. The principle, so far as a Member of the House is concerned, is that those who elect that Member have the right to instruct him in regard to their interests, and the Representative has absolutely no right to act adversely to such instructions. When his conscience will not permit him to carry out his instructions, the Congressman's plain duty is to resign his office, or, better still, not to accept the office unless it is his purpose to act agreeably to the instructions of his constituency.

This was the chart by which Senator BROUSSARD steered his long political course, and the fierce criticism from party associates from all sections of the Union, as well as a constant continuation of attacks by a portion of the press and political leaders of his own State, failed to swerve him one jot or tittle from these well-defined principles—principles that led him to consider the interests of his constituents superior to the claims of party and to vote for the paramount interests of his people at the peril of his own political decapitation.

After his removal from the Ways and Means Committee of the House for refusal to permit a party caucus in Washington to dictate his course and vote, he boldly commenced his candidacy for the Senate, and faced the people on the platform from the Arkansas line to the Gulf, giving a reason for the faith that was in him with such logic and sincerity that he was chosen over two able and distinguished men of State-wide reputation, with great experience as campaigners.

The primary election being ratified by the legislature in May for a term to begin two years later, he went before the people of his district and was once more, although an elected Senator, chosen as the Representative of his district, a distinction without a parallel.

For 25 years he was a member of the Democratic State central committee of the State. He was an uncompromising advocate of the nomination of Woodrow Wilson, and secured a portion of the State vote in the convention for the illustrious man who so successfully piloted our ship of state through the great war.

When ROBERT F. BROUSSARD entered the United States Senate he was no novice to the work of legislation. He came from the House a seasoned veteran, who had ably filled important committee assignments. The years of study on tariffs and waterways and naval affairs and public lands made him an authority on these subjects. His continued advocacy of an intercoastal canal from the Rio Grande to the East, at first considered a fantastic dream, drew the attention of engineers and transportation experts, and after some preliminary surveys the project was found not only feasible but a sound Government investment, which will eventually reduce the cost of transportation of the vast products of the coast, reduce the perils of ocean traffic, save insurance, and develop an immense section of our common country. It is already one of the permanent waterway projects of the Nation.

He closed his services in the House of Representatives on the last day of the Sixty-third Congress and entered the Senate on the first day of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

He served as chairman of the Committee on National Banks and as a member of 10 other committees. It is needless to say that his fund of information, acquired by long service in the House, made him an efficient and useful Member.

He was a firm supporter of all the war measures of the President. His health, already impaired on his entrance to the Senate, was rapidly undermined by the strenuous demands on his time, pouring in a steady stream from thousands of constituents. Against the advice of his physician he remained at his post of duty. Every heart throb beating with love of country, he felt the call of duty to give his all, and he gave the last full measure of devotion with the same self-sacrifice that the noble, heroic dead gave on the battle fields of France. He knew his physical machinery was giving way, yet with that sublime courage which so persistently characterized his whole life he gave his all to his country.

He died at home with the faithful and devoted wife, his loving companion of years from youth up. He was indeed a tender and affectionate husband. His religion was bound by no creed. He believed in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and delighted in service to the weak and those in distress.

The elements of success in that long career, unmarred by a single defeat in so many contests in which his personality and his conduct were frequently the issue, were the traits so lovingly described by an author as the characteristics of the Creoles of Louisiana: "A people that are tender-hearted and sympathetic in their social and domestic relations. The almighty dollar, that great object of universal devotion throughout our land, seems to have no genuine devotees in these particular villages." These splendid people, who retained on the shores of the Gulf and the banks of the beautiful rivers and bayous of south Louisiana the customs and language of their ancestors through generations, are distinctively American. These people who, indifferent to the material things, lived in their simplicity, paying great heed to the spiritual and romantic, loved ROBERT F. BROUSSARD with an affection rarely found in all this earth. He was the one trusted adviser and confidential friend to whom they could bring their business and family troubles and find a ready sympathizer and able counselor. He possessed a rare perception of human character, with an iron memory which never lost a face or place or an event once seen or known. No man could overreach him, excepting only those to whom he gave his heart.

The affection of these people for their distinguished fellow citizen became expressed in their familiar and endearing term, "Cousin Bob."

An illustration of the confidence in his power and influence is well told by an occurrence during his senatorial campaign. In the same primary there was a strenuous campaign for the nomination for governor. One of these eloquent gentlemen addressed a large audience in south Louisiana. At the close he was warmly congratulated by one of his hearers, who had been deeply impressed. "Well, then," said the speaker, "I can count on your vote for governor?" "Oh, no, no, sir; me for 'BOB' BROUSSARD—'Couzin Bob.'" "But," said the candidate, "he is not running for governor; he is running for the Senate and I am running for governor." "Well," was the reply, "me don't care about that; you be for 'Couzin Bob' and he 'p'int you governor."

He held the hearts of his people with unbounded affection. His campaign centered around no issue save the personal success of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD. In a district so distinctively Creole, material interests could never overcome the spiritual and romantic friendships of the everyday masses.

The relation between ROBERT F. BROUSSARD and his constituents is, however, best described by our illustrious President, who has with remarkable clearness in words expressed the human trait of friendship, when he said at Manchester, England—

> Friendship is not a mere sentiment. It is based on a principle; upon a principle that leads a man to give more than he demands. It is based not merely upon affection, but upon common service. The man is not your friend who is not willing to serve you, and you are not his friend unless you are willing to serve him. And out of that impulse of common interest and common desire arises that noble feeling which we consecrate as friendship. Friendship depends not on fancy, imagination, or sentiment, but upon character. Real friendship is abiding, like charity it suffereth long; loyal in ill report, and the brightest jewel of happy days. It is the highest, truest love. Its heights are serene; its valleys cloudless. It requires a capacity for faithful affection, a clear discernment, and a beautiful disinterestedness. Fragments of friendship are precious, but a whole, real friend is a man's greatest blessing. Faith with loyalty and courage brings one close to the kingdom of heaven.

The soul of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was filled to the utmost with this precious quality.

When the funeral services were held under the sunny skies and majestic live oaks in front of the courthouse at New Iberia, the eloquent tributes by Congressman RODENBERG, of ILLINOIS, and Senator VARDAMAN, of Mississippi, found receptive hearers in the thousands of tear-dimmed eyes and aching hearts of the vast multitude who laid aside the business of the day to pay a last sad tribute to the loved leader and friend of the whole people—the true type of the Louisiana Creole, who embodied the lovable traits of that people so noted for its hospitality, real friendship, and splendid citizenship.

He died poor in purse but rich in noble deeds and great service to the State and the Republic.

His name will share the common fate which comes to all, regardless of exalted stations occupied or wealth possessed; but the inspiration to the youth of the State of that long life of service, of unselfish patriotism, and heroic sacrifice to duty in the hour of his country's peril will bear fruit in a higher and nobler citizenship which will be consecrated to the perpetuity of a Government that will stand for justice and civic righteousness for all the peoples of the earth.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I want to say that these same faithful people who so loved and admired ROBERT F. BROUSSARD have arranged to see that his virtues receive fitting commemoration by the erection in his home city of a monument or other suitable memorial, and from the prospectus setting forth the purpose of this memorial association I wish to read the beautiful tribute paid our departed friend at the time of his death by one of his Louisiana friends and admirers:

> The career of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD must impress his people with the inspiration that talent and character, unaided by fortune, may bring place, power, and reputation. It must stir in them a solemn pride that a long tide of power and repute may come to an honest man and leave him whole-hearted and pure minded, unscarred by temptation to yield the right for victory or to stoop low for gain.
>
> As lawyer, as district attorney, Congressman, and Senator, "BOB" BROUSSARD made multitudes of friends. He was entitled to them, for he was loyal and generous. Affection for him was widespread and deep, both in Louisiana and at Washington, and extended to many of those with whom he contended. He had that faculty of winning and captivating men which belongs to the warm-hearted. His passing will bring a tear to many an eye in Louisiana and sadness to many hearts more.
> Magnetic in personality and a natural leader, BROUSSARD established himself as political chieftain of the third congressional district. By the force of those qualities and by the practical value of his services in Congress, particularly to the sugar interests of the State, during the many years he was there, he so won the district that opposition to him was never considered.
> He never "fell into line" for old abuses, even though those who profited by them might be in position to give him trouble in his campaign. He held aloof from combinations of politics, and upon all specific State issues he stood for cleaner and better conditions in life and politics.
> He refused to profit by oppression or to submit to it. Upon one occasion, in his campaigning, he encountered what he took to be underhanded tactics in his adversaries. He made a speech at one of his meetings in the third district denouncing these tactics. It was a genuine outburst of oratory, grand in its fire and patriotism, somber and powerful in its defiance, and superb in its declamation. It was in French, and we doubt if any Mirabeau or Vergniaud ever poured forth a more livid flood of indignation and passion.

Yet the chief characteristic of this dead Senator was lovableness. He was sunny, even tempered, just, patient, kind, unselfish, and generous.

Peace to your ashes, BOB BROUSSARD. "There has been frankincense and myrrh in thy life which will not be lost now that thou art ground in that mortar, wherein God's will is the pestle, which men call eternity."

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR HUGHES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk. I ask that they may be read, and I move their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 423) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of Hon. WILLIAM HUGHES, late a Senator from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, though myself young in membership in this distinguished body and not intimately acquainted with its earlier history, I very much doubt if the amazing necrological record of the past 22 months has ever been duplicated.

Since March 5, 1917, ten times the gaunt, unrelenting hand of death has thrust itself into this Chamber and has stricken down a Senator of the United States. Strong men, vigorous men, who have never previously known defeat, have fallen victims to the unconquerable malevolence of that insatiable and final foe.

If there be those at home, in the remote communities of our respective States, who fail to grasp the magnitude of the burdens which fate has placed upon the shoulders of the Nation's Legislature during the prevalence of the war and of the reconstruction period which follows, I can only pity them for their ignorance. What wonder if men bend and break under the strain and are swept into the Great Beyond in the twinkling of an eye.

Let me give you a brief review of the life of my recent colleague, the late WILLIAM HUGHES. It is an amazing recital, and no duplicate can be found in the annals of any other nation. Only in democratic America, whose portals have never known bolt or padlock, would such a career be possible.

WILLIAM HUGHES belonged to that very notable and ever-increasing class of citizens who, though foreign born, attain positions of great distinction in America. So many similar instances are encountered in the annals of our people that, as a rule, we no longer think it sufficiently noteworthy to comment upon it.

Though probably of Welsh lineage, as his surname suggests, he was a native of Ireland, having been born there April 3, 1872. He was only 8 years of age when the initial steps in the Americanization of WILLIAM HUGHES took place, he having accompanied his father to this country in the year 1880.

He was then a bright-eyed, impulsive lad and was possessed of an inquiring, acquiring mentality. No emigrant ever landed upon our shores whose perceptions were keener or who was animated by a livelier sense of inquisitiveness.

Even at that early age, while utterly unconscious of the full possibilities which destiny had in store for him in the New World, yet he seemed to sense the opportunity for a life with which he was previously totally unacquainted.

Thus, after the father's establishment in his new environment, the boy entered the public school, and there were laid the foundations of his equipment for the duties which afterwards devolved upon him and for the honors which subsequently were his portion.

Still, his educational advantages were comparatively slight. His father had located in a manufacturing city, Paterson, N. J., and there, in the silk factories of that community, one of the most remarkable of the varied industries of America, many of the youth of the city found agreeable employment, which drew them from the schools at a comparatively early age. This was the magnet which limited the schooling of WILLIAM HUGHES.

While as a rule we can but sympathize with those proponents of the advantages of a higher education who decry child labor as a detriment to our sociological development as a Nation, yet, in the case of WILLIAM HUGHES we see an illustration of the principle that genius will out and that inherent ability is bound to overcome all obstacles, and, like water, will reach the level which opportunity makes possible.

Let us picture young "BILLY" HUGHES—such was he called from the cradle to the grave—at his silk loom in Paterson at the age of 12 or 14 years. Did this employment serve to dwarf his mentality or curb his ambition? Assuredly not.

Is it difficult to employ our own imaginations and conjecture his emotions as he stood at his loom with the shuttles flying backward and forward? As warp followed warp and woof succeeded woof, all in wondrous colorings and patterns, were there not times when his fancy was even more nimble than his fingers and its product more notable than the fabric which resulted from his handiwork?

That aspiring spirit which finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and a lesson of some sort in every phase of human endeavor, and in every object in life, whether tangible or intangible, is the true student, and opportunities for achievement which are presented to him are limitless.

Such a student was WILLIAM HUGHES, and he graduated with high honors from the university of human experience.

While still a mill hand he studied stenography and typewriting, and, as he reached manhood, engaged in that avocation within whose ranks to-day are found so many thousands of young Americans of both sexes.

Originally entering a commercial establishment he soon thereafter found employment in the law office of former Attorney General John W. Griggs.

Whether luck or fate influenced his final choice of a profession, it is impossible to say. That is a matter for the speculator and philosopher to dwell upon. Certain it is his entrance into that field determined him to engage in the study of law, and in due course of time, in 1900, he was admitted to the bar as an attorney, and became a counselor three years later.

WILLIAM HUGHES possessed many of the qualifications which make for success in the legal profession. He was quick-witted, possessed natural forensic ability, and was powerful as a pleader before juries.

One of his eulogists, a writer for one of his home papers, thus speaks of him:

He was not a great lawyer and never pretended to be, for he was not long enough in practice to gain the experience that fits men of a legal turn of mind for big things, yet he had grit and much native ability.

That fairly portrays WILLIAM HUGHES as a member of the bar. He had all the innate ability which would have made him a celebrated constitutional lawyer had his inclinations led him in that direction. But his tastes and habits induced him to cultivate a different branch of his profession, jury trials, and in that direction he won a pronounced degree of success.

In due course of time, in 1912, by appointment of the then governor of New Jersey, Woodrow Wilson, Representative HUGHES—he was then in Congress—attained the distinction of a place on the bench as judge of the county court of Passaic.

Let us see what judgment his fellow members of the bar have passed upon him. Following his decease the Passaic County Bar Association, in a eulogistic set of resolutions adopted, said:

As a lawyer he stood among the leaders of his chosen profession. Admitted to the bar as attorney, June term, 1900, and as counselor, June term, 1903, he practiced with honor to himself and his profession. He had a keen analytical mind, and was always faithful and painstaking toward the interests of his clients * * *. The Passaic County Bar has lost a worthy, able, and loyal member.

In open court, following the death of Senator HUGHES, Judge W. W. Watson, of the same tribunal over which the deceased had presided a few years previously, said:

It is eminently fitting and proper that the court in which he sat should take suitable action on his death. This community always delighted to honor him in life, and I join with counsel in the general regret of his untimely death. He had the confidence of the people in every course of action, and this confidence was never found to be misplaced.

WILLIAM HUGHES as a lawyer and judge is less intimately known to the public than as a legislator. The brief quotations I have made show the high place he occupied in the esteem of his professional brethren.

The career of Senator HUGHES upon the bench was brief, his elevation to the Senate following within a few months after assuming the judicial post. Upon this point a local Paterson writer has said:

In public life he liked every place he ever held, and was enthusiastic for the work, except that of presiding judge of Passaic County, which the President, then Gov. Wilson, appointed him to. That was not to his liking, especially when sentence day arrived, as he once imparted to a friend, he hesitated on that day, for he did not relish the idea of sending his fellow man to prison. He was anxious to leave the bench.

The true sphere of our former comrade was in the strenuous arena of deeds heroic, as a practitioner at the bar, as a commanding figure in the halls of legislation, or as a soldier in the field, had fate called him to such an experience.

And this reminds me that during the Spanish-American War he did offer his services to his country, enlisted in the Second New Jersey Volunteers, and was sent to Florida, but like most of us who were enrolled in the army of the volunteers, at that time he saw no actual service at the front. But the spirit of patriotism, of service, was there, and he was ready to go wherever sent in defense of his country and flag.

The chief service of WILLIAM HUGHES was as a national legislator, he having served nearly eight years in the lower House and almost five years in the Senate of the United States.

His original election to Congress was a notable achievement, and one which shaped his whole public career. His entrance into the political arena had taken place in 1901, when he had been a Democratic candidate for the assembly from Passaic County. Though defeated, his party being in the minority, he ran considerably ahead of his associates, the result of a very aggressive campaign on his part.

In 1902 he became the Democratic nominee for Congress. His competitor was Col. William Barbour, one of the wealthiest and most representative Republicans of that section. Col. Barbour had been, a few years previously, treasurer of the Republican national committee. He was an extensive manufacturer, and, oddly enough, it was in his mill that HUGHES, when a youth, had originally been employed.

The contest, so far as the Democratic candidate, then a young man of only 30 years of age, was concerned, was recognized as a forlorn hope. The success of Col. Barbour, in a district theretofore Republican, was looked upon as a certainty.

Nevertheless, the young lawyer-millhand plunged into the contest with that ardor which characterized all his activities, and conducted an aggressive, effective campaign of a sort never previously witnessed in that district. When the polls were closed, it was ascertained that the wide-awake, young Irish-American had carried the day, his majority being 3,800.

Two years later he was defeated by a margin of only 510 votes at a time Roosevelt carried the district by 5,200. In 1906 he was reelected, as he was in 1908 and again in 1910.

It was during the close of his fourth term, in 1912, that Gov. Wilson appointed him to a judgeship in Passaic County.

Concerning the career of my former colleague while a Member of the House I shall not speak in detail. There are other Senators on this floor who were Members of that body with him, and they may dwell upon that phase of his public service.

It is a fact, however, that he attained a degree of prominence in that body, and long before his service there had terminated he was recognized as an active force in the development of the legislative program.

His influence in the House chiefly grew out of the fact of his extreme popularity among all classes, leaders and led, his amiability, good humor, and camaraderie being recognized by men of all parties. The friendships there established by him were maintained throughout the remainder of his life.

On January 26, 1913, the legislature being then in session, he was chosen United States Senator for a full term of six years. At the preceding primary election, September 24, 1912, he had been the choice of his party, his election following, as stated, this being the final legislative choice of a Senator in my State prior to the adoption of the constitutional amendment regulating the choice by popular vote. He took his seat in this body March 4, 1913.

Concerning the scope and character of his service here I will defer to other Senators who served with him and who are more familiar with the subject than am I.

Yet the Nation at large knows that he speedily attained a position of influence in this body and became a member of various important committees, being chairman of the Committee on Pensions at the time of his death.

His strong personality soon manifested itself, and new friendships were created, strong and abiding in character, as had been the case during his career in the other branch of Congress.

His every action was characterized by a warmth of feeling, a deep emotionalism, which attracted and attached men to him and made them his friends and his confidantes. Among his associates WILLIAM HUGHES, the Senator and statesman, became BILLY HUGHES the man. It was as such they learned to love him, for he was intensely human, and his heart was always overflowing with sympathy.

A primary element in his success grew out of the fact that, in spite of any professional or political honors which came to him, WILLIAM HUGHES never forgot his mill associates, and until the close of his career was ever an insistent champion of the hand toiler in every walk of life. Before judge and jury, on the rostrum, from his place in House and Senate, he demanded that the rights of the laboring man must be subserved if genuine democracy should be maintained—a doctrine no true American can controvert.

One of the most notable characteristics of Senator HUGHES was his vigorous partisanship. Upon this point one of his intimate friends, Joseph P. Tumulty, has recently said: "He was an intense Democrat."

In his last speech in this body, January 12, 1917, he emphasized his party loyalty, saying, in a defense of the South:

> We have kept the fires on the altars of democracy lighted in the North and in the East and in the West in this country by means of the patriotic fervor and flame that has been furnished to us by these men of the South.

No man should be censured for his love of and devotion to party, for entertaining admiration for its achievements and affection for its leaders. Like a certain other distinguished Senator from a sister State, my former colleague was never ashamed to say "I am a Democrat."

But WILLIAM HUGHES was more than a partisan. He was a patriot. While for his party he had a deep affection, for his country he entertained an undying, almost holy devotion.

In his last public utterance, in a speech delivered in Newark, he said:

> I don't know whether you approve of the things I have tried to do while I have been in the Senate. Of course, I know that many of my acts have been proper subjects of criticism. There is one thing you must say of me—it is that I have always voted as an American United States Senator

In his final speech in this Senate, to which I have already referred, delivered January 12, 1917, he said:

> As far as I am concerned, I am an American citizen. I have not a single fiber in my body which entertains or could possibly entertain the slightest prejudice for any section of the country. I love the West, I love the East, the North, and the South. They are all alike. They are welded by a great fire into one Nation.

That was the fundamental mainspring of his life, a genuine patriotism, founded upon an unadulterated Americanism and exhibiting no tinge or shadow of hyphenization. As his friend, Mr. Tumulty, had said of him: "His Americanism was of the purest kind."

My association with WILLIAM HUGHES in this body was very brief. I entered this Chamber March 5, 1917, and he passed out of it a month later, never to return. He was nearing the twilight of his earthly career, and he knew it.

The concluding stages of his life have been thus described by one who knew him intimately:

> He was a great soul. For years he had been suffering from the malady which finally ended in his death. He knew for the past few years the nature of the trouble which afflicted him, yet he never made outward show of his great pain and agony. To his intimate friends, who learned to love him because of his big, generous, democratic nature, he was still the cheerful, loyal, useful associate.

When I called upon him in the hospital in this city that was the state of mind in which I found him—cheerful, genial, optimistic.

Of course, he longed to get back into his seat that he might play his part in the great struggle for civilization into which his country had been plunged. That he was unable to perform the service which he desired to render in the great crisis which confronted the Nation naturally gave him deep concern; yet he complained not that destiny had eliminated him as a factor in the supreme conflict.

Finally came the end of all things mortal to WILLIAM HUGHES, at the capital of his and my State, January 30, 1918. His life had been a strenuous one, but the close of it was peaceful. Like a tired child, weary with the activities of the day, he closed his eyes and slept. The victor in many battles was vanquished at last by the invincible conqueror, Death.

Upon the occasion of his obsequies, February 2, 1918, the officiating clergyman said:

> First of all, friendliness. Yes; that was a conspicuous virtue of his. A genial and kindly personality, a glad readiness to serve anyone; a real spirit of approachableness, showing a true appreciation of kinship with his brother man.
> I am sure you will agree with me that he had a genius of friendship. How well he exercised that gift finds evidence to-day in the altogether deep and universal sympathy and sorrow that find expression in the thousands of lives his life touched.

That exquisite tribute to the memory of WILLIAM HUGHES found a responsive echo in the hearts of those who heard the distinguished divine, for the most of them could bear testimony from personal experience that their deceased friend and neighbor was precisely the sort of man thus depicted.

In simple, terse, yet eloquent terms, one of his home papers thus phrases the same tribute:

> The great gathering that turned out yesterday afternoon to attend the funeral of the late Senator HUGHES was a fine tribute to a man who has made himself loved not only in Paterson but throughout the State and in the National Capital. BILLY HUGHES is no more, but his memory will long live in the hearts of men.

Beneath the flower-decked sod at Cedar Lawn Cemetery lies all that was mortal of WILLIAM HUGHES. No more shall we gaze upon the familiar form of our friend and associate.

But not even death itself can deaden the power of recollection or curtail the sweep of our affections. While memory shall hold sway over our intellects we shall have before us the kindly smile, the sympathetic speech, the generous act of him who, though now sleeping the last great sleep, yet still liveth in our thoughts and in our emotions.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the tribute which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has just paid to his departed colleague is so complete, so comprehensive, and so beautiful that I can only hope to add a few words of appreciation.

The Senator from New Jersey has well said that the career of Senator HUGHES illustrates the possibilities available to a young boy, whatever his station in life, by the institutions of this country. There is no place, however exalted, to which he may not aspire, and which he may not reach by perseverance, constant effort, and merit.

Shortly after Senator Broderick, of California, entered this Chamber he had occasion to refer to his own obscure origin and to describe in language which I can not hope to emulate the career which in America opens before every boy who desires to avail himself of his opportunities. He closed by pointing to the painted symbols in the vaulted ceiling of the Chamber and said, "Senators, there you behold my father's handiwork."

Senator HUGHES began life amidst surroundings and apparent difficulties which would easily have discouraged a less resolute and persevering nature, but he made it a point to do well whatever he turned his hand to. He began life as a mill boy, and during his apprenticeship he learned not only the details of his own particular field of employment, but he mastered those of every branch of the business.

He was a member of the Senate Committee on Finance, and as such took part in the framing of the so-called Underwood-Simmons tariff bill. He there displayed an extent of information regarding the silk industry, which comprehended all of its phases and details from the beginning of operation upon the raw material to the sale of the finished product. He did not stop there, but was familiar as well with its domestic and international markets, and with all of those details, knowledge of which is supposed to be in the possession only of those who are in full management of and who have devoted their lives to the subject.

Subsequently, when it became necessary to encourage the dye industry because of the difficulty of obtaining material in consequence of the war, Congress enacted an additional measure for the encouragement and development of that industry. He had virtual charge of the subject in the committee and again he displayed a familiarity with and a knowledge of the subject to which I think no other member of that great committee possessed. The work was his. The bill as presented finally to the consideration of the Senate was the offspring of his industry and of his genius more than that of any other member of the committee.

I once expressed to him my surprise that he should have so completely comprehended and that he could so well remember the technical details, as well as the general reach of the subject, in view of his devotion to other fields of effort, particularly in the practice of the law and in the service of his country. He replied that he never turned his attention to anything without realizing the necessity of thoroughly familiarizing himself with it as far as possible. That was the more remarkable, because during his membership in the Senate he did not to me seem to display any great qualities of application or industry, notwithstanding his constant attendance upon the sessions of the Senate.

If I were called upon to mention any other outstanding characteristic of Senator HUGHES I should say that he was a man of the highest moral courage; a man of the strongest convictions; a man whose idea of duty was its rigid performance, regardless of consequences. Shortly before he was elected to the Senate a pension bill was considered by the other House which, if enacted, would add an annual burden of $50,000,000 to the fixed expenditures of the Nation. He worked and voted against it; he spoke in opposition to it. Every sort of inducement was brought to bear upon him to withdraw his opposition. Finally the suggestion was made that if he voted against the measure it would mean his defeat for reelection. He replied that his seat was not worth $50,000,000 to the American people; they could not afford to pay any such price to secure his reelection. Needless to say, Mr. President, the people of his district admired his courage and gave expression of their approval by elevating him to the Senate of the United States.

Senator HUGHES, Senator James, and Representative HEFLIN, of Alabama, were during the Senator's term a trio of inseparable friends. They were companions of the most genial character; all of them young, strong, hearty, vigorous, and each apparently endowed with a long lease of life. They were among the youngest Members of the American Congress. They were the life and soul of every gathering of which they were a part. Their companionship was welcomed and hailed by all who knew them. I know of no friendship or association more human in all of its phases than that which existed between these three splendid gentlemen. But two of them have gone to their long home, and only one remains. May he long live to mourn his departed friends.

I think, Mr. President, that the death of Senator HUGHES had much to do with the early demise of his dear friend, Senator James. Senator James was deeply concerned, very anxious regarding the outcome of Senator HUGHES's malady. He went to see him every day of his life, and one could tell what the progress of the disease was by watching the demeanor and conversation of Senator James. Finally Senator HUGHES was removed from the city and was taken to Trenton, N. J., where, I think, he passed the remainder of his life. During that time Senator James was in constant communication with him, frequently visited him, and kept his associates and colleagues informed regarding Senator HUGHES's condition. I saw Senator James shortly after Senator HUGHES's funeral, which he attended. He seemed to be heartbroken, despondent, discouraged. His face had that drawn and painful expression which indicated his own physical infirmity. It was not at all surprising that the one should have so soon followed the other.

Mr. President, the genial companionship of a man like Senator HUGHES was a pleasure to his associates. He was always, even when disturbed by some passing incident, open, generous, and always lovable. He did his part in the work which was committed to the consideration of the Congress while he was a Member of it. He impressed himself upon every feature of our legislation. He told me shortly before he was stricken that he had given the better part of his life to the public service, and that it remained for him now to do something for his own family and dependents; that he would no longer aspire to a position in public life, but that at the end of his term he would resume the practice of his profession. That, Mr. President, is a reminder that many a man gives the best that is in him without reward or hope of reward in public service like his, and that as time passes he is compelled to realize that he has been faithful to the public at the expense of those dependent upon him for their existence.

He died poor. His long service, from the commencement of his public life to its close, covering a period of 12 or 15 years, if applied to the practice of his profession would have made him a competence and left his family comfortable and in the enjoyment of modest wealth. The man, Mr. President, who gives such an exhibition of service is indeed a patriot.

These are the claims of Senator HUGHES to the love and gratitude of his country. I am sure that they have given and will continue to give them in full measure.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the life history of the late Senator HUGHES, of New Jersey, as detailed here so graphically by his former colleague [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], gives ample food for reflection to those who study our American experiment in democracy. It marks the rise of a strong, active man, of unusual intelligence and character, from humble beginnings to a position of honor and influence among his fellows.

Careers of this sort are luckily not unusual in our American Commonwealth. Out of the seething mass of our industrial life stalwart figures emerge here and there by no special rule of opportunity, inheritance, or geography, and force their way to universal recognition. It is one of the happy results of our common-school system and our form of government.

The life of Senator HUGHES is remarkable because he began his life as a wage earner, gaining his living by manual labor in a factory and acquiring his education under most difficult and discouraging circumstances, and because he became the Democratic representative of a Republican State in the United States Senate. In these respects he began lower than most successful men, and he achieved a position that few men in any State succeed in reaching.

But the arresting fact about Senator HUGHES is that he continued to be the same man, the same "BILLY HUGHES" throughout his life. As a Representative in Congress he was as simple and direct; as a Senator he was as unassuming as when he drew a pay envelope on Saturday night.

The temptation to assume importance, to "put on airs," is usually irresistible to men who have risen from the ranks. Workingmen tell me that the hardest master, the most intolerant superintendent, is the man who has been himself a workingman. Economists say that the true conservative is not the man of inherited wealth, not the man of leisure, not the student or the philosopher, but the man who has risen to eminence under the existing rules of life. What has been good enough for him is good enough for all others.

Not so with "BILLY HUGHES." He began as a radical; he continued in Congress as a radical; and he completed his career in the Senate as a radical. He kept up his acquaintance with his early friends. He began as a man of the people and as a man of the people he died.

He was a particular friend of the private in our Army. We obtained from him glimpses of the hardships and of the treatment of the private soldier at the hands of officers that we obtained nowhere else. It was Senator HUGHES who insisted upon and forced to successful adoption the statute which increased the pay of the common soldier from $15 to $30 a month.

He had a faculty of stripping away the veneer of society and showing up a problem in all its stark nakedness in the blazing light of day. Time and again I have seen him in the Senate settle a question with a short sentence or two by speaking the simple, blunt truth, when all the rest of the Senate was circling around the problem and mincing words. The colleague of Senator HUGHES at the time of his death has referred to the last speech Senator HUGHES made. I am confident that every speech of Senator HUGHES that can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be discovered to bristle with these blunt, simple facts which could not be dodged when once they were placed before the Senate and before the country.

Mr. President, this is no place for repeating anecdotes or witticisms, but all who knew Senator HUGHES will recall countless instances when his humor flashed out with startling brilliance. And yet he never lost his standing as a man of fixed purpose and sound judgment, as so many have done who have acquired reputations as humorists.

To say that a Member of the United States Senate is honest is ordinarily not much of a compliment. A man is expected to be honest in the Senate, to keep his word, to do as he agrees, not to cheat or deceive, just as much as he is required to be 30 years old and to swear to support the Constitution. But to be intellectually honest, in the sense of being honest with one's self, of realizing principles and clinging to them tenaciously, of refusing to yield principles for personal ease or party advantage is a rare quality, and that quality Senator HUGHES had to a remarkable degree. His rugged strength was an inspiration to his associates. He made it easier for his colleagues to satisfy their consciences.

And Senator HUGHES had an appreciation of the finer side of life. He always opposed a tariff on sculptures, paintings, and works of art generally. I remember hearing him one day expatiating on the good that a cheap print of a masterpiece would do in an humble home, citing the Angelus as a conspicuous example. He said that instead of putting a tariff on such works of art, and especially on the cheaper reproductions, the country could well afford to place a bounty upon them, if bounties were ever defensible.

He fought not only for the protection of women, children, and workingmen, for the rights of the common soldier, for the exclusion of prison-made goods from competition with goods made by free labor, and against the stop-watch system, but also he fought for the protection of birds and animals. He had a tender heart and an artistic perception. The finer things of life had for him a strong appeal. A brave, strong, rugged man, honest, diligent, intelligent, in the prime of life, Senator HUGHES could ill be spared from his country's service; but those of us who knew him, who were privileged to be his friends, are the better for his example, for our association with him, for the things that he taught us, and the strength that he gave us. The thought of him makes it easier for us to do a hard thing that we know to be right.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the colleague of our deceased friend, has spoken so fully my thoughts, and has spoken them so much more clearly than I shall be able to speak them, that I call attention to his tribute in my address, so that those who are interested in the history, the life, and the characteristics of Senator HUGHES may know where to find it and where to read it with a genuine pleasure. It comes from the heart and mind of a political opponent—a political opponent from the deceased Senator's own State. It speaks with a sincerity and with a force and with a soul that will be recognized by all who read it.

The good deeds of Senator HUGHES have been recorded. His struggle through adversity to the highest place in the land and in the affection and esteem of the people of this country have been described in detail by the distinguished Senator. There are other Senators here who have already spoken and others who will speak who have known Senator HUGHES longer than I have known him; and while they feel no deeper friendship for him than I feel or hold him in higher admiration, it will be recognized that they are better qualified to do justice to this peculiarly great American citizen than I am. It is for such reason that I speak but briefly the intimate thoughts that come to my mind.

I believe I understand the life of "BILLY" HUGHES, and yet I have found much difficulty in describing that character even to myself. I can not compare him with some other statesmen. He was himself. He knew no forms. He followed no examples. He had no heroes to worship. He made no effort, as far as I know, to emulate any great character or any great statesman. He seemed to be moved by his own ideals, by his own impulses with regard to what was just and what was right and wrong, and when moved by those impulses he was totally unconcerned with regard to the effect that his action might have upon his personal welfare.

When I first met him I was charmed by his wit and by his humor and by his easy quotation of the most beautiful passages in poetry; I was edified by his knowledge of history; and yet these things that then impressed me so deeply are but a few of the many charms of this versatile man. I looked on him then as the humorist, as the wit, as the care-free, happy-go-lucky man who loved life, who loved happiness, who loved and trusted his fellow men. At this first meeting I saw nothing of the deep and sincere seriousness of the man. While I saw that in him to make me love him, I did not then see those traits of character which would lead me to admire and respect him as I afterwards learned to do.

It was not long, however, before I found out that these characteristics were but the screen that concealed the more serious man behind; and since then, as these war pictures have come to my mind, I have thought of those characteristics that I noted in that first meeting, as the beautiful blooming flowers that are hung over and in front of those great guns that prevented the Huns from devastating civilization. The same determination, the same invincible power to fight forever for right, and with the same grimness, lay behind those beautiful screens of flowers. And then when I saw him roused to antagonism against a foe, when I saw him defending the principles that he loved, defending the cause of labor, the cause of the orphan, and particularly the cause of the little children against the attacks of the selfish moneyed interests of the country, I was impressed with the idea that he was a cold, harsh, determined man of steel, an unbending man, a man who had no nerves, a man who was simply a machine for the defense of principle. He showed no patience with subterfuges. He showed no tolerance with deceit and hypocrisy and plutocracy. He made no compromises with it. He denounced it for what it was, in language that was brutal to those against whom it was directed. He feared not for their feelings nor for the forces that they might bring to bear against him; and in that fighting attitude, in that uncompromising, unbending attitude, he seemed to be the hardest, coldest man that I had ever known. And yet later I saw him sitting as a member of a committee, listening to the story of suffering of a little family, listening to the plain, unvarnished statement of the deprivations of little children, I saw the great soul well up in him and the tears rain out of his eyes upon his desk like those of a gentle woman.

He was BILLY HUGHES. He was harsh, he was gentle; he was beautiful, and he was abrupt. He scorned publicity; he ridiculed conceit and vanity. In his splendid analytical ability he not only saw the shallow attempts of others, the lightness of their grasp upon great questions, their finite being, but he saw it in himself, and he ridiculed it and treated it with the contempt in himself that frequently gave him the appearance of being a careless, carefree, thoughtless man. And yet, with this complex disposition, with this character that caused him to jump from the joyful to the sorrowful, from the gentle to the brutal, he was always working fixedly to one end, and that was to throw around the weak and the helpless and the downtrodden and the oppressed of every land every protection of law and society. There never was a bill, there never was a provision in a bill that could be made so seductive that in principle was against the interest of the masses that could persuade his support for a single moment. There were provisions of bills that appealed to other strong supporters of the laboring class of this country to such an extent as to lead them astray, but they never appealed to BILLY HUGHES. He knew intuitively what was right, and he never failed to stand back of his intuition.

There were greater orators, but never was there an orator who spoke in a greater cause. There were statesmen possibly more learned, but there never was a statesman who was more often right. He was a valuable Member of this body, and he was a valuable citizen of the country. He has cast credit not only on the Senate but upon American citizenship. As has been stated by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], his life is a tribute to our form of government. His career is an absolute denial of every suspicion that was ever cast upon the possibilities of the highest success of the plain people under our Republic. It stands out as an example that will stimulate the hope and the ambition and the honor and the fearlessness of poor young men throughout all this country.

Senator HUGHES did God's work on this earth. From the very beginning of his young life until its completion he did good. He loved little children. He nurtured them, he protected them. He loved women, and he threw around them the protecting arm of the law so that they might not be oppressed by the injustice of greed. He hated everything that was mean, that was cruel, that was ungodly. His every-day life was the strongest confession of good, of God, that man could make in any temple on earth. His soul grew and grew all the time that he was on this earth, and according to the law of God it will continue to grow on and on throughout eternity. He worked here under every hardship, against every disadvantage, under terrible suffering. He accomplished a great deal. He has done much in the brief life that God saw fit to give him on this earth; and we know, beyond argument or suspicion, that his life has not been in vain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is customary now to say that while "in the good old times of the Republic" the schoolmaster was in the habit of inciting the ambition and spurring the zeal of his pupils by reminding them that anyone of them "might some day be elected President." Such an appeal can not be made now in this time of "control by money and organization." Senator HUGHES was a living illustration of the opposite note to this pessimism. He worked in a mill as a common wage earner; he saved money, studied law, became a successful practitioner in the courts of the East, where the best lawyers are supposed to be; was elected for several terms as a Representative, and then later as a Senator in the Congress of these United States. Although he never became nor aspired to become President, nor was even constitutionally qualified for it, his career was proof of the fact that the day of opportunity for achievement of high place in America, if only intellect, energy, and industry exist and are summoned to the task, has not become a thing of the past.

When he came to the House he was equipped for his duty. What is more, and what can not be said of all who begin a career there, he did not stand still; he grew day by day in information and power. He was not of the class who sought position as a final consummation, or a rest or a release from work; he sought it as a stepping stone to higher achievement and as a vantage ground for better and more useful work.

Having been a workingman himself, he knew the situation, the hardships, and the rights of laboring men, and his public career was mainly a work for their welfare and advancement. He also, for the same reason, knew when anybody was demagoging in the name of "labor," and his righteous indignation and impatience when this was the case was something beautiful to behold, and his verbal outbursts when he "bawled out," as he phrased it, men who came for unjust things in advocacy of which some of them hoped to exploit themselves, and others were merely deluded, was something fine to hear. Those whom he thus honestly reproved and thereby taught would stand things, or "take things," as we Americans say, from him, Mr. President, that they would not have heard, except in indignation, from you or me. It was because they knew that he was "one of them"; they knew that all his sympathy and love were at their service without hypocrisy or mere lip service.

I have sometimes feared for him politically when I have heard him as a member of the Finance Committee of the Senate say strong things to visiting delegations, but they generally said, "Well, Billy must be right, maybe he knows better than we do what can be done for us; anyhow we know he wants to do what is best for our interest," and left Washington still his friends. BILLY HUGHES, as his friends loved to call him, took pride in being of that Welsh stock which has exhibited such a rare combination of practical sagacity and idealism in the persons of so many great men, from Thomas Jefferson, at the very birth of this Republic, to David Lloyd George, at the helm in England at this moment. This race trait he possessed, and it enabled him to understand and cooperate with the high purpose of that idealist, and yet practical statesman, the former president of Princeton University, later governor of New Jersey, Senator HUGHES'S State, and now President of the United States.

I first met BILLY HUGHES when he first ran for Congress, having spoken in his district in behalf of his candidacy and in the interest of the political party to which we both belonged. Every two years afterwards, as long as we were both in the House, I went up to New Jersey "to help him out," as he called it. His home life was sweet and modest and full of mutual affection.

In the House and the Senate he seemed to select and attach himself to a few friends, and having "their adoption tried," "grappled them to his soul with hooks of steel," making intimates of them. Next to his honesty of purpose and devotion to the just interests of the masses of men and his remarkable and sweet family affection, his loyalty to friends stood out as his salient characteristic. Most of these friends of his thus made intimates by him in the two Houses of Congress have preceded or have followed him into that other world, which all partially dread and partially long for.

Those of us left have missed him sorely and will continue to miss him; while without ever seeing them again, or seeing them but seldom, we shall continue to sympathize with and love his loved ones of whom he often spoke with just pride and deep affection when talking to close friends, though, of course, he did not wear his heart on his sleeve for every daw to peck at.

To him who has loved much, much shall be forgiven. This dead friend of mine intensely loved his fellow men and especially those whom God committed to his charge, and God will pay it back in kind—as Leigh Hunt says He paid Abou Ben Adhem—in the supreme coin of God's love.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, my colleague, Mr. BAIRD, unfortunately is detained on account of illness. He has sent a communication which he has requested me to read in closing these exercises. He says:

I regret that I am unable to be present personally to pay a tribute to the memory of my predecessor in office, the Hon. WILLIAM HUGHES. I knew him personally, and while aware of his illness, which he bore with patience and fortitude, yet I did not think that that illness would have a fatal termination; indeed, it was farthest from my thoughts that he should pass away and that I should be his successor.

I knew WILLIAM HUGHES to be a self-made man, in the best acceptance of that term. He had, by the exercise of native ability, by industry, and by sacrifice, raised himself from humble circumstances to an exalted position in the Nation's service. He enjoyed the trust and the confidence of the people, who honored him by making him their representative in the House and the Senate.

In all his public service as soldier, jurist, and lawmaker, he was loyal, faithful, and efficient. His loyalty to his country was shown when he promptly responded to the call to arms in the Spanish-American War. He had the respect of all who were acquainted with him, while those who came in close association with him were charmed by his amiable disposition and warm heart. In everything that he did he was manly and straightforward, and he had a host of friends. The State and the Nation sustained a great loss by his death in the prime of manhood and when he had developed his talents for useful public service.

To his widow and those nearest and dearest to him the sense of deep loss should not be unmixed with a feeling of pride in his splendid achievements, a record of public service which will perpetuate his fame as long as the history of this great Republic shall be known to mankind.

DAVID BAIRD.

Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, January 27, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, January 26, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. WATKINS as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the men who think deeply, act nobly, and accomplish deeds for the public weal, men who fix their thoughts on the eternal values of life and leave behind them paths which others may follow with impunity.

Such were the men whose accomplishments and deeds we are here to record. They have gone, but their works live.

Give us the intelligence, the courage, and grace to do the work Thou hast given us to do, that we may pass serenely on to the larger life in the realms beyond.

Bless, we pray Thee, their colleagues, friends, and those who are nearest and dearest to them in life with the blessed hope of the life eternal.

We are startled and our hearts are bowed down by the sudden and unexpected departure of another Member of this House. Comfort us, we beseech Thee, and all who knew him, in Thine own way.

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

Footprints that perhaps another,
Sailing o'er life's solemn main,
A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,
Seeing, shall take heart again.

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate,
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait.

And everlasting praise be Thine through Him who taught us the way and the truth and the life. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the reading of the Journal will be deferred until to-morrow.

There was no objection.

THE LATE SENATOR BROUSSARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the special order for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, January 26, 1919, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 520.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the privilege of being a close, intimate friend of the late Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, a friendship that existed from the time that he first entered public and political life.

I met him first when as a recent graduate in law he followed the leadership of the late Gov. F. T. Nicholls, and side by side with our present Chief Justice E. D. White and ex-Senators Murphy J. Foster and Donelson Caffery he stumped the State in the great antilottery campaign in a successful effort to rid the State of an institution that had for many years exerted a most corrupting influence in State politics.

Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was born August 17, 1864, on his father's plantation at Loreauville, near New Iberia, La.

As a boy he attended the public and private schools of his home parish until he attained the age of 15 years, when he entered Georgetown University, at Washington, D. C., where he remained for three years.

In 1885 he was appointed inspector of customs at New Orleans, from which position he resigned after taking the civil-service examination and qualifying as assistant weigher and afterwards as expert statistician.

While working for the Government in the city of New Orleans he found time to attend the law course at Tulane University, from which institution he received the degree of bachelor of laws in 1889. Returning to his home in New Iberia he formed a law partnership with J. Donelson Foster, a brother of ex-Senator Murphy J. Foster, under the firm name of Foster & Broussard.

From his boyhood he took a great interest in public affairs, both State and national, and it was but natural, therefore, that his political activity should be coincident with his entrance into the practice of his chosen profession.

He was made a member of the parish Democratic executive committee, and soon afterwards was elected as a member of the Democratic congressional committee and Democratic State central executive committee, and remained a member of the last-named committee for more than 25 years.

When in 1890 the Democratic Party in the State of Louisiana was torn asunder on the antilottery question and the burning issue was whether or not the charter of this institution should be renewed by the State, Mr. BROUSSARD joined the antilottery forces, and in this memorable campaign, which at times threatened bloodshed, he showed himself to be a fearless, aggressive, and eloquent speaker, and from then on his political advancement was most rapid.

In 1892 he became a candidate for district attorney for his judicial district, and though he was bitterly fought by the prolottery wing of the Democratic Party, which controlled the parochial organization, he still won out by a small majority, being the only antilottery candidate to carry the district in this election. With such consummate ability did he fill this office that he was subsequently reelected without opposition.

In 1896 the Hon. Andrew Price, who had most ably represented the third district in Congress for many years, withdrew from public life and declared that he would not stand for reelection.

The struggle that followed for the Democratic nomination, though friendly, was both sharp and spectacular.

Judge A. C. Allen, a well-known and able jurist, of St. Mary Parish, contested for the nomination with Senator BROUSSARD, then district attorney. In those days nominations were made by conventions, and in the selection of delegates for the convention there was a contest in every parish in the district.

When the convention assembled at Morgan City the result was still in doubt. The instructed delegates were evenly divided between the two candidates, and it remained for the parish of Terrebonne, which, with 18 delegates, was entitled to 9 votes, to settle the issue.

Balloting was delayed for many hours in the effort made by both contending factions to capture the organization of the convention, but this did not result in an advantage to either candidate.

The roll call began in breathless silence, with all eyes centered on the parish of Terrebonne, whose 18 uninstructed delegates were entitled to one-half vote each. It was generally known how all of these delegates would vote, with the exception of one man, and upon his half vote depended the final outcome of this most exciting contest.

This man was John R. Grinage, who, when his name was called, rose in his seat and said: "Gentlemen of the convention, Tennessee has her 'Bob Taylor,' New Orleans has its 'Bob Davy,' and I believe the third district should have its 'BOB BROUSSARD.' I cast my vote for BOB BROUSSARD."

This brought this remarkable contest to a close, and BROUSSARD'S nomination was thereupon made unanimous, and he became the Democratic nominee from the third district.

But his troubles were not yet over. The sentiment in the third district was strongly for protection, and the Republicans placed in nomination Judge Taylor Beattie, of Lafourche, a most able and well-known jurist and statesman, whose splendid record as a Confederate soldier and as district judge made him a most formidable opponent.

Both candidates favored protection and both were most forcible speakers, but BROUSSARD had the advantage over his opponent in that he spoke French as eloquently as he did English, and in a district where French was the mother tongue of a large majority of the voters this advantage was used with most telling effect.

BROUSSARD'S majority in this election was 2,833 votes, the smallest majority he ever received in his contests for Congress.

He served in the Fifty-fifth to the Sixty-third Congresses, covering a period of 18 years, and so well and faithfully did he serve his constituents that he was opposed in but three of the nine consecutive times that he ran for Congress.

In 1912 Congressman BROUSSARD announced himself as a candidate for the Senate against the Hon. J. Y. SANDERS, now a Member of this Congress, and who was then governor of the State of Louisiana. Gov. SANDERS had been elected by the legislature to the Senate in 1910 to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator McEnery, but having declined to resign the governorship in order to take his seat in the Senate, the legislature thereupon elected the Hon. John R. Thornton to fill the unexpired term of Senator McEnery.

Congressman Arsene Pujo, who had served the seventh district of Louisiana with great ability for many years, also entered the senatorial contest. It was conceded from the outset that the race was between SANDERS and BROUSSARD, and it was thought that the candidacy of Pujo would weaken BROUSSARD, as Gov. SANDERS was the organization candidate. This three-cornered contest for the Democratic nomination was one of the most exciting in the political history of the State, as both BROUSSARD and SANDERS were able and aggressive campaigners, and both were extremely popular.

BROUSSARD, however, developed remarkable and unexpected strength in the city of New Orleans, which was thought to be the organization stronghold, and when the vote was counted it was found that BROUSSARD had such a substantial plurality over his two opponents that Gov. SANDERS declined to run in a second primary, and Congressman BROUSSARD was thereupon declared the nominee.

While Senator BROUSSARD was elected to the Senate in 1912, yet as he was not to take his seat until March 4, 1915, it appeared that he would have to retire from public life for two years.

But his friends and constituents would not consent to dispense with his services and insisted upon his retaining his seat in Congress until he entered upon his term of service in the Senate. While he met with some opposition, he was nevertheless nominated by a large majority, and elected for his ninth term in the lower House, where he served until he was sworn in as United States Senator.

Senator BROUSSARD'S success in Congress was due to the fact that he was always vigilant and zealously guarded the interests of his constituents. He seldom addressed the House, but when he did he always commanded attention, as he spoke eloquently, forcibly, and to the point. He was a bold and aggressive debater, and he never hesitated to assert his views plainly and unequivocally, nor did he hesitate to fearlessly challenge that which he did not approve.

As the Representative of the great sugar-producing district of the State of Louisiana, he made a close study of the sugar industry, especially as to the necessity for its protection against foreign competition, and it was generally conceded in both branches of Congress that he was an authority on any question pertaining to sugar.

That his intimate knowledge of this industry and aggressive fight in its behalf when it was being assailed by free-trade advocates was an important factor in saving the sugar industry in Louisiana from destruction is admitted by everyone familiar with the facts.

He was severely criticized, both at home and at the Nation's Capital, when he accepted an appointment on the Ways and Means Committee at the hands of Mr. CANNON, who was then the Republican Speaker of the House of Representatives.

But this appointment enabled him to render signal service to the sugar, rice, and lumber industries during the framing of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill under the administration of President Taft, and that his action met with the approval of the majority of the people of Louisiana was shown by the fact that he was subsequently elected to the United States Senate, even though he was opposed by two popular and strong contenders.

He conceived it to be his duty to faithfully reflect the views of his constituents and to sustain the policies to which they stood committed. Adverse criticism never for one moment swerved him from this course, and an appreciative and admiring constituency not only indorsed this policy but they did not rest satisfied until they had elevated him to the highest office within their gift.

Senator BROUSSARD'S activities in Congress were not, however, confined to tariff issues. He was most vigilant and watchful in behalf of the rivers and navigable waters of Louisiana, and through his efforts many of our natural streams were improved and made navigable, and the great Atchafalaya Harbor at Morgan City was recognized by this Government as a worthy project, and financial aid is now annually extended in deepening and improving that harbor.

It was Senator BROUSSARD who was among the first to grasp the great advantages that would accrue to Louisiana by the construction of an intercoastal canal from the Rio Grande to the Mississippi River. He made repeated trips with the United States engineers over the proposed route of this canal, and so impressed them with the great relief that this would give in the way of transportation that upon the recommendation of the engineers the project was adopted, and this canal, which will do so much for the development of south Louisiana, is now in course of construction.

When Senator BROUSSARD was sworn in on March 4, 1915, the Democratic Party was in control of the Senate, and the recognition which the leaders gave him was indicative of the reputation he had gained in 18 years' service in the House. He was made chairman of the Committee on National Banks and was a member of the Committee on the Census, Claims, Library, Manufactures, Naval Affairs, Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, Post Offices and Post Roads, Public Buildings and Grounds, and Rules.

While Senator BROUSSARD served but two and one-half years in the upper House, yet in this time he established for himself the same reputation for ability, efficiency, and brilliancy which he had established in the lower House. His duties in the Senate were both numerous and exacting, but they were discharged with such fidelity, and the results obtained were so satisfying to the people and great interests concerned, that it was generally conceded that had he lived he would have been returned to the Senate without opposition.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus far spoken of the life and public services of Senator BROUSSARD, but I can not close these remarks without paying tribute to the personal character of one who, for more than 20 years, was my close personal friend.

Constant association and contact with him not only inspired admiration of his ability, but no man could be much thrown with BOB BROUSSARD without soon learning to love him. It was never my privilege to know a man with a more even temper and with more personal magnetism. There was a simplicity in his manner that attracted everyone with whom he became acquainted, and to know him was to remain his friend and admirer.

He had few, if any, enemies. He loved his fellow men. His heart bubbled over with kindness and generosity.

In his political career he had many sharp and bitter contests, and yet when the smoke of the battle had lifted it was always found that BOB BROUSSARD had emerged from each struggle stronger and more popular than when he entered it.

He was a man of intense convictions, and he had the courage to express them, but he fought so fairly, so frankly, and so openly that no one even questioned his sincerity, and he came out of his political contests with the admiration and respect of those who had fought him most bitterly.

He was from the people and he always continued to be one of them. He gave to his humblest constituents the same consideration and attention that he gave the most powerful. He considered himself the servant of all the people, regardless of their station or condition.

The Broussard family is one of the largest in Southwest Louisiana, and when Senator BROUSSARD was first elected to Congress his numerous kinsmen began to call him "Couzan Bob," and this name gradually grew in popular favor until he was called by this name from one end of the State to the other.

A Creole himself, "Couzan Bob" was the idol of the Creoles, who constitute most of the population of the third Louisiana district, and he was most deserving of this popularity, as he was always accessible and always faithful to the interests which they so repeatedly committed to his trust.

Senator BROUSSARD had no children, and his affections were centered upon his wife, Miss Manette Applegate, and she it was who through his months of illness and suffering was his constant companion and gave him the love, care, and attention that not only prolonged his life but made his last days cheerful and comfortable.

When death was near at hand, Senator BROUSSARD, notwithstanding the orders of his physician, refused to deny himself to his friends. So long as he was conscious, he insisted that they be admitted to his chamber, and as long as he had the strength his hand was always extended in cheerful and friendly greeting.

Mr. Speaker, Senator BROUSSARD possessed many splendid and beautiful traits of character, but if I were asked to select the one which was most to be admired I would unhesitatingly say his devotion and loyalty to his friends.

I can never forget that even when death was staring him in the face he made a special trip to Washington for no other purpose save that of joining with his colleagues from Louisiana in the doing of a generous act which he felt would redound to my interest and advantage.

His kindness, his achievements, and his triumphs will always be a precious memory to those who loved him, and I count it as a priceless heritage to have had the privilege of enjoying his friendship.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Speaker, the one dominant, outstanding trait in the sterling character of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was his uncompromising loyalty to conviction. This was the very genesis of his political creed. With courage born of the highest conception of duty he was as true and steadfast to his ideals as is the needle to the pole. With full confidence in his own rectitude of purpose, he valiantly championed that which he believed to be right without hope of praise or fear of criticism. His fine spirit rebelled at the very thought of sacrificing conviction for popularity.

"BOB" BROUSSARD never deserted a friend or abandoned a principle. He knew naught of expediency and he did not care to know. He was incapable of deception, and all the world recognized in him a brave and manly man who, in victory and in defeat, stood "four square to all the winds that blow."

It is now 20 years since I entered Congress, and within a few days after becoming a Member of this body it was my good fortune to make the acquaintance of our departed friend. Instinctively attracted by a personality that radiated sincerity and good fellowship, I soon formed an attachment for him that ripened into the warmest friendship of my entire congressional career. There is no man, living or dead, for whom I entertained a more genuine affection that I did for "BOB" BROUSSARD. To-day, as I recall that close intimacy of two full decades, unmarred by a single unpleasant incident, I feel myself again under the spell of that genial, friendly smile. Again I feel the hearty, sincere handclasp; again I hear the pleasant, cheery words of greeting. Methinks I see him now erect, courtly, chivalrous, unaffected—one of God's noblemen.

Mr. Speaker, it is not given to mortal man to comprehend the mystery of life and death. We can not quite understand a dispensation that removes from the activities of life one who was in the very prime of vigorous manhood and at the very zenith of his intellectual powers, with years of splendid usefulness still stretching out before him. With a faith that has its foundation in our belief in the immortality of the soul, we bow to the Divine will and accept the decree. It is this sublime and sustaining faith, a faith that rises "triumphant o'er our fears," that dissipates the mists of doubt and gloom, and in this solemn hour unfolds to our enraptured gaze the glories of the eternal morn. For him the mystery has been solved and the future stands revealed. "After life's fitful fever he sleeps well."

Knowing BOB BROUSSARD as I knew him, I know that death had no terrors for him. I know that he approached the end calmly, unflinchingly, majestically. He lived and died—a gentleman. Great in life, grand in death, now glorious in memory! For 18 years he occupied a seat in this Chamber, and for more than two years he was a Member of the Senate of the United States. During all of that time he served his constituency with an intelligent zeal and fidelity equaled by few and surpassed by none. Broad in his sympathies, generous in his nature, unfailing in his good humor, "with malice toward none and charity for all," he was never known to turn a deaf ear to the cries of distress. Often have I seen him retrace his steps to dispense charity to some blind or crippled mendicant whom he happened to pass on the street. He was never happier than when doing some kindly, gracious act. He loved his fellow man deeply, sincerely, and that love found expression in the most thoughtful consideration for all who came in contact with him. Fearless and independent, courteous and cultured, conscientious and constructive, eloquent and logical, BOB BROUSSARD possessed all of the elements of the ideal legislator. It is no wonder that he has left the impress of his strong and virile personality upon the history of his day and generation, and in the memory of his many noble deeds, nobly done, he has reared for himself a monument that will endure so long as sentiment abides in the hearts of men.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day to say our last official word of appreciation of our friend Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, whom so many of us remember as a long-time Member of the House. When the Sixty-fifth Congress assembled more than one-third of the Senate roll was composed of former Members of the House of Representatives. There were JOHN H. BANKHEAD and OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama; MARCUS A. SMITH, of Arizona; JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, of Arkansas; JOHN F. SHAFROTH, of Colorado; FRANK B. BRANDEGEE, of Connecticut; THOMAS W. HARDWICK, of Georgia; JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, of Illinois; JAMES E. WATSON, of Indiana; CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas; Ollie M. James, of Kentucky; JOSEPH E. RANSDELL and ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, of Louisiana; JOHN WALTER SMITH, of Maryland; HENRY CABOT LODGE and JOHN W. WEEKS, of Massachusetts; WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH and CHARLES E. TOWNSEND, of Michigan; KNUTE NELSON, of Minnesota; JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi; William J. Stone, of Missouri; GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK and GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska; FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, of Nevada; Jacob H. Gallinger, of New Hampshire; WILLIAM HUGHES, of New Jersey; WILLIAM M. CALDER, of New York; ASLE J. GRONNA, of North Dakota; KENNETH MCKELLAR, of Tennessee; MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas; WILLIAM H. KING, of Utah; CLAUDE A. SWANSON, of Virginia; WESLEY L. JONES and MILES POINDEXTER, of Washington; NATHAN GOFF and HOWARD SUTHERLAND, of West Virginia; and ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin.

Of the long list of our former colleagues in the House Senators James of Kentucky, BROUSSARD of Louisiana, Stone of Missouri, Newlands of Nevada, Gallinger of New Hampshire, and Hughes of New Jersey have passed away within two years, a remarkable harvest of the reaper whose name is Death. Think of it! Of 37 ex-Members of the House who were Members of the Senate in December, 1917, six have died, or one in every six, a mortality more than ten times greater than that of our troops in war! Their going makes us exclaim, as Warren Hastings exclaimed when he heard of the death of his opponent in a political campaign, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!" It makes us remember that—

The glories of our birth and state
Are shadows, not substantial things.
There is no armour against fate.
Death lays his icy hand on kings.
Scepter and crown must tumble down,
And in the earth be equal made
With the poor humble scythe and spade.

Mr. BROUSSARD had passed nearly half his life in the city of Washington. He was educated at Georgetown University, over beyond Rock Creek, and in his college days looked daily across from those commanding heights that overlook the Potomac to the tall Dome of this great Capitol. How little could he foresee that he would spend more than 20 years beneath this Dome. Going home to Louisiana from Georgetown he studied law at Tulane University at New Orleans. Then practiced law at his home in New Iberia, and almost immediately was chosen prosecuting attorney, which position he resigned to come to the House of Representatives. In this respect he followed the course that so many other men have taken. A successful representative of the people in the courts of his home community often has many of the qualities that make him a successful Representative in this House. And Mr. BROUSSARD had these qualities. He loved to be among the folks about him. He could have said truthfully with Kipling—

For as they come and as they go,
Whatever their degree,
The people, Lord, thy people
Are good enough for me.

It was no pretense that made him the genial companion of all those about him. He understood them, and so they were drawn to him.

He had other qualities that made him distinguished as a legislator. Though a Democrat, he was great enough to put the welfare of his people above his party. All who were here in the Sixty-third Congress will remember his gallant fight for the industries of his State when the Underwood tariff bill was under consideration. I will not stop to recall the details of that contest; but the stand made by Mr. BROUSSARD against party opposition displayed courage and patriotism of the highest type.

Though a fluent and convincing speaker, Mr. BROUSSARD did not often take the floor, and never unless he had something worth while to say. He did not expand the RECORD much, but every session he was with us in either end of the Capitol he expanded the list of his friends and admirers. He is with us no more, but he is the sort of man who makes us think more kindly of the world beyond the grave, because he is the sort of man whom we want to meet again. When he was living on this earth and we were about to go to New Orleans, that lovely southern metropolis was more desirable if we knew that BOB BROUSSARD would be there to welcome us. In the eternal summer of the celestial city, free from care, eternity will surely be more worth while to those who can look forward to a welcome and a friendly smile from ROBERT F. BROUSSARD.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, BOB BROUSSARD and I were born and resided in adjoining counties. We knew each other practically all our lives. We both entered politics together in the memorable campaign of 1892, he being elected district attorney of his district and I being elected a member of the Louisiana House of Representatives, both running and both winning on the antilottery Democratic ticket.

In the many campaigns that Mr. BROUSSARD had in the early days when he was first elected to Congress from the third district we always fought side by side. In after years our personal ambitions clashed and we fought each other just as frankly as we had previously fought together, but our personal relationship was never interfered with by our political differences. Politically Mr. BROUSSARD and myself differed on many things and many occasions, but personally our relationship was always that of friend one to the other.

I believe no man in Louisiana had more friends than Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD. He served those friends according to his lights and did that which he thought was right. His death has left many a sorrow and many a wound in Louisiana. He had a large circle of friends, a large circle of relatives, and a family all proud of him and of whom he was proud. He is gone. Peace be unto him, and may comfort come to those who loved him.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, when I came to Washington as a Member of this House one of the first acquaintances formed beyond my own delegation was with the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana, ROBERT F. BROUSSARD. Our acquaintance was casual and formed in the usual way that such acquaintances begin, but as time passed and we were thrown more intimately together in the discharge of our respective official duties and had longer and larger opportunities for association that acquaintance developed into a friendship of the most ardent nature. I do not exaggerate when, speaking for myself, I confess that it became an affection.

I have been much gratified and pleased at the splendid tributes that have been paid to both the personal and official life and character of my deceased friend. I indorse all that has been so beautifully said. No man within my memory or acquaintance with whom I have ever associated was broader in his conception of the right or braver in his determination to do the right than BOB BROUSSARD. True, generous, and confiding, always and under all circumstances a gentleman of the most pronounced type. When the sad message was flashed to Washington announcing the death of Senator BROUSSARD my tears mingled with the tears of his loved ones. I realized that the Nation had lost one of its wisest and best legislators, the State of Louisiana one of her loftiest, noblest, and truest citizens, the wife a kind, affectionate, and loving husband, and I had lost one of my dearest friends.

Mr. Speaker, I can not add to this splendid eulogy contained in the New Iberia Enterprise of April 20, 1918, a paper published in the city where Senator BROUSSARD lived and died:

"OUR MOST POPULAR STATESMAN LAID TO REST—THE PEOPLE'S FRIEND MOURNED BY THE WHOLE STATE.

"Last Tuesday New Iberia had a day of deep, intense mourning and sorrow connected with the interment of Iberia's most distinguished son, United States Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, known in terms of universal love and admiration as 'Couzan Bob.'

"Nature seemed to have carved from the calendar the most beautiful day of the month and fused it with the very heart throbs of his numberless friends and devotees. The majestic oak in front of the courthouse, under which he lay in state, with its graceful branches and protecting foliage, lent a somberness, a deep-felt solemnity, mellowed in tone and tinged by the ever-evasive, eluding sun's rays, to the close of his life and career, a typical epic of completed work and silenced loyalty.

"The mute evidence of tears and anguish, the unuttered sympathy and worship of the moving mass of humanity attending the obsequies, is the finest, most imperishable monument laid at his bier. Friend and foe in handclasp felt the sting of the silence of death. The yawning grave about to absorb his most precious mortal remains deepened the unfathomable mystery which cancels brilliancy of mind, loyalty of heart, warmth of friendship, of lofty service of a staunch and stern citizenship, exacted the inexorable tribute of reverence and homage. No public man on the stage of Louisiana's political life has ever dominated and controlled as completely as our departed friend Bob the friendship, the love of his fellow citizens. The personal magnetism will be the phenomena of the record of his deeds. In all his varied and multitudinous activities—political, social, and fraternal—the same element of humane feelings characterized the results. He put man and life above the economic materialism which plays so large a part and is such a prominent feature in our American life and consciousness. It is this recognition of the successes and failures, the hardships and privations, the punishments and rewards of the common man of the crowd, the struggling mass of darkness and adversity, the achievements and triumphs of those creators of wealth and opportunities of the industrial realm of the State that wove the laurel wreaths, the crowns of service, placed upon his brow of useful, honorable career.

"Leading the simple life, wanting no extraordinary luxuries and improvised extravagances, he became an apostle of work and industry without the poison of pride and the power of glory. The best weapon and equipment in his battles and successes were his spirit of natural humility and modesty.

"He felt nature to be the best instructor, with no shams and pretensions, with no false ideas or artificial attitudes. Under stress, in storm and tempest, he followed the rigid rules of his manhood and conscience. He believed thoroughly in the honesty and integrity of the silent, spiritual voice in human nature. He worshipped the truth and the limitation of man's ability and intellectual capacity. He hated shadows and gave consideration to substance. Illusions appeared as the germs of poison in his great solemn enterprises. His whole public career, his congressional history, his senatorial services reflect this personality. Everything credited to his victories during the passions and prejudices of political campaigns, every trophy brought back from any contest where right and loyalty were being assailed and menaced, breathes in a large degree the soul of his unimpeachable, unspotted service. We have many Creoles and Acadians in the public life in the State of Louisiana, but none, so far, has yet, in public estimation and dispassionate judgment and unbiased mind, reached the height of popularity which must be accredited to the place in the niche of fame occupied by mourned BOB BROUSSARD.

"Words can never heal the wounds and cure the scars inflicted by the Grim Reaper. Those pains have to be borne by saint and sinner alike. The laws of nature provide places for shadow and sunshine. Each is necessary to the enfoldment of creation. In our humble capacity, in the feeble way tendered to mankind by speech and signs and tokens, we offer our most heartfelt sympathies and sincerest condolences to the grief-stricken widow and immediate relatives.

"An elaborate funeral program was insisted upon by the public and heartily responded to by the fraternal societies of which he was a long and valuable member. The Pythians, the Elks, and the Masons spared no effort and labor to make the last tribute of respect one of the brightest pages and chapters of his history. His life-long and intimate friend, Mr. Louis A. Walet, under the strong impulse of friendship and love delivered a most eloquent funeral oration that is very seldom listened to and privileged to be heard. United States Senator VARDAMAN, of Mississippi, one of his colleagues in the United States Senate, delivered, in one of the noblest and most inspiring efforts, a eulogy of which any poet or painter of word pictures would be eminently proud. Many tears from men and women in the audience were seen to furtively roll down the cheeks as a manifestation of that sacred thrill which love and admiration generates. This completed the public ceremonies and started the march of the funeral cortege to the Catholic graveyard where his remains were temporarily laid at rest in the tomb of Mr. Felix Patout.

"In spite of the presence of the sepulcher and the lugubrious atmosphere, a bright light, the sunshine of hope pierced the pall of distress of his widow and relatives and friends when another of his former colleagues in Congress, Hon RODENBERG, of Illinois, delivered the last and most touching panegyric human being ever listened to. With a sincerity and deep emotion engraved on every word spoken and sentence delivered his deep emotion and overwhelming fraternalism overwhelmed all within the reach of his voice. Love, friendship, and charity, fraternity and equality, were the reward which went down to the grave into eternity. Memory will forever treasure and refresh with the spirit of emulation and recognition of the heart's value and the soul's rôle in nature's days of busy life the crowded record of the career of BOB BROUSSARD.

"The munificence and luxuriance of the floral decorations were reminiscence of the extensive ramifications the effect of his public life had upon the political and industrial development of the State of Louisiana. Those were symbols of the fruit of the tree of life, the utility of man's service, a health and the proper investment of man's faculties. Each garland represented every drop of his life dedicated to the duties he assumed and the work he accomplished. Upon that altar of self-sacrifice and inspiring patriotism rests a finished temple erected to his life and memory.

"The pallbearers were his two brothers, Hon. Edwin S. Broussard, Albert Broussard; Richard P. Steckler and Preston Guilbeau, brothers-in-law; a cousin, Silvio Broussard; and intimate friends, Dr. George J. Sabatier, William H. Price, and Van Beary.

"Among the distinguished senatorial committee here to attend the obsequies were Senators JAMES K. VARDAMAN, of Mississippi; THOMAS P. GORE, of Oklahoma; HENRY L. MYERS, of Montana; WILLIAM H. THOMPSON, of Kansas; WILLIAM F. KIRBY, of Arkansas; JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, of Louisiana; and HOWARD SUTHERLAND, of West Virginia. Mr. F. J. Delahoussaye, a page in the Senate, also accompanied the party to New Iberia.

"The Representatives were WATKINS, DUPRÉ, LAZARO, ASWELL, WILSON, SANDERS, and MARTIN, of Louisiana, and RUCKER, of Missouri. Representatives ESTOPINAL, of Louisiana, and LANGLEY, of Kentucky, who were also named on the committee, were unable to serve. The party was in charge of W. D. Meng, Assistant Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and included, besides the legislative Members, George W. Hess, superintendent of the United States Botanical Gardens and a close friend of the dead Senator.

"Aside from the members of the two congressional committees, Gov. Pleasant, and others, among the prominent mourners were Federal Judge George Whitfield Jack and John C. Pugh, of Shreveport; Judge Winston Overton, of Lake Charles; Senator Bertrand Weil, of Alexandria; Senator A. O. Boyer, of Avoyelles; Col. W. M. Price, of Thibodaux; J. Martin Hamley, of Lake Providence; Lieut. Gov. Fernand Mouton; Secretary of State James J. Bailey; State Auditor Paul Capdevielle; Fred J. Grace, registrar of the State land office; Attorney General A. C. Coco; W. B. Lee, of Shreveport; R. N. Sims, State bank examiner; Numa Montel, of Lafayette; H. R. Speed, of Monroe; John H. Overton, of Assumption; Dudley L. Guilbeau, of Opelousas; Commissioner of Agriculture Wilson; and State Treasurer Henry Hunsicker.

"In the New Orleans party were included State Food Administrator John M. Parker; Rene F. Clerc, president of the board of trade; Richard O. Otero; R. E. O'Rourke; James Thompson, of The Item; Maj. A. D. Stewart; and Senator G. J. Labarre.

"Hundreds of telegrams of condolence poured in, among them one from President Wilson, which was as follows:

"'WASHINGTON, D. C., April 16, 1918.

"'Mrs. R. F. BROUSSARD, New Iberia, La.:

"'May I not express my profound sympathy with you in the death of your husband.

"'WOODROW WILSON.'

"The R. F. Broussard Memorial Association was organized here. The leaders of the movement are the many friends of the late Senator, who were in attendance at his funeral. The association is headed by Col. W. H. Price, of Lafourche, president, and Henry B. Pruden, of Covington, secretary. Every bank in the State is authorized to receive donations and enter them to the account of the association. Further information will be given by Col. W. H. Price, of Thibodaux, or W. H. Pruden, of Covington. The object of the R. F. Broussard Memorial Association is to raise funds to finance the erection of a suitable monument to the memory of Iberia's beloved son.

SUPPORTED WILSON.

"Mr. BROUSSARD was a loyal supporter of Woodrow Wilson for the presidential nomination in 1912, and it was largely through his influence that the vote of Louisiana at the Baltimore convention in 1912 was split between Wilson and CLARK, and on deciding ballots swung to Wilson.

"Mr. BROUSSARD enjoyed the distinction of being reelected to the House of Representatives after he was elected United States Senator by the legislature. His term as Senator did not begin until March 4, 1915, and in 1912 he was reelected to another two-year term in the House, serving in that body until he took his seat in the Senate."

Mr. DUPRÉ took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I served longer in the House of Representatives with Senator BROUSSARD than any other Member from our State now in the House. He served in the House and the Senate together, in the various Congresses from the time he entered until the time of his death, over 20 years. Gen. Myer also served for 20 years. I believe that Sam Robinson served 20 years. Senator RANSDELL has served more than 20 years, including his service in both Houses. Looking back over the various acts which Senator BROUSSARD performed and the various measures which he advocated, I can say there was no man who was ever more devoted to the interests of his constituents, or who was ever truer to his duty as a Representative, or who ever more properly aroused the great respect, admiration, love, and esteem of his constituents than ROBERT F. BROUSSARD. When I first knew him he appeared as a boy, soon after he had come from the city of Washington, where he had attended for three years Georgetown University. He was then in the customhouse in the city of New Orleans, where he was acting as a Government official. He held two different positions there. The whole city of New Orleans was then boiling and seething and worked up to the highest pitch over the question whether the Louisiana State Lottery should be continued in power as one of the most grinding monopolies ever organized in any government, whether it should be allowed to continue as a corporation, as a business institution, or whether it should be destroyed by the vote of the people.

At that time the people of the city of New Orleans, and to a large extent through the entire State of Louisiana, were so entwined and intermingled and influenced by the lottery and its ramifications were such that it reached nearly every household. Servants in the homes would pilfer for the purpose of contributing their means to sustain this infamous, iniquitous, corrupt gambling concern. It had been instituted during the Republican régime, during the reconstruction period, in the State of Louisiana, and had so embedded itself in the public mind and in public institutions, and had ingratiated itself so in the minds of the people, that it was almost impossible, even with the herculean effort made by the citizens of the State, to disorganize, disrupt, and finally overthrow it.

I speak of this for the purpose of showing the circumstances surrounding the people, the enormous amount of money at the command of the lottery. It was openly buying members of the legislature, it being known at the time as high as $50,000 was paid for the vote of a member of the house or a member of the senate.

During the time of this corruption by this gambling institution, ROBERT BROUSSARD, a young man, a boy, surrounded by all these influences, stood up for the interests and rights of the people, the security and morality of the citizenship of the State of Louisiana. As referred to by Gov. SANDERS, who has just preceded me, he and our former governor and United States Senator Foster, in the same section of the State as Mr. BROUSSARD lived, all worked together against the lottery. At the time the question was finally put to the Legislature of the State of Louisiana the lottery amendment only lacked one vote of having two-thirds, one senator having died.

Mr. BROUSSARD was elected district attorney soon after he was inducted into the practice of law. His courage, his skill, his tact, were such as to enable him to win the confidence of the people to the extent that when he became a candidate for Congress, seven years after he became district attorney, at the age of 33 years, he was elected to Congress.

With him the question of sugar was paramount, this industry of the State being the living of his people, who were dependent on their success in producing and marketing their sugar crop, which was the staple product in the southern part of Louisiana. The very way that BOB BROUSSARD pronounced the word "sugar" was attractive. From the time he entered Congress up to the time of his death nothing was left undone that could have been done by him to enable them to reap the advantages of the great agricultural interests in his district.

There are many things which could be said of ROBERT BROUSSARD. Those of us who are here to-day who attended his funeral know there is no eulogy which could be passed in honor of the memory of the man which would more fully ingratiate him into the love, affection, and esteem of his people. We who were there on that occasion, who saw the remains under the shade of the great oak trees, remember the vast concourse of people, too large to gather in any assembly hall. The subdued voices, the tearful eyes, and throbbing hearts expressed the confidence, esteem, and respect that his people had for him.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I regard it a special privilege to be given an opportunity to-day to speak a few words in memory of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, who served many years as a distinguished Representative in this great body, and who afterwards represented with honor his great State in the Senate.

Shortly after coming to Congress I became acquainted with Senator BROUSSARD, then a Member of the House, and that acquaintance ripened into a friendship deeply appreciated by me.

At all times courteous and gentlemanly, he won the respect and affection of all with whom he came in contact. He possessed a most delightful and attractive personality, which charmed those with whom he associated. Knowing him as I learned to know him, it was easily understood why an appreciative constituency loved to honor him as a representative in public life.

He had in him all the elements that tended to make a successful career and those who knew him well in his long and courageous public service to his State and Nation have paid eloquent and deserved tribute to his worth and character. He had the courage of his convictions, and with marked ability did he sustain himself in the many contests that characterized his public life.

He entered upon his official career early in life and for nearly a quarter of a century he was in the limelight of public opinion. He met with singular ability every test that determined his fitness for the positions of trust that he filled with such distinguished honor.

He ended his long and brillant career in the very prime of his manhood.

My relations to him were those of a personal friend. His courtesies and friendship were appreciated by me. The recollection of his many virtues will be a sweet memory as long as I shall live.

There was a charm about him that few men possessed, and it was a delight to be with him. I learned early to love him and shall always be glad that I knew and had the friendship of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, ROBERT FOLIGNY BROUSSARD was in his fifty-fourth year when death claimed him. Almost half of his entire life—practically all of his adult life—was spent in the city of Washington, first as a student of Georgetown University, then as a Member of this body for 18 years, and finally as a Senator of the United States, which exalted office he was filling at the time of his death. He had accordingly come to be a familiar figure in the Nation's Capital, and counted among the official and resident and visiting population of the District of Columbia a large number of warm personal friends. News of his demise, therefore, was received here with the greatest regret and with manifestations of deepest sympathy. How widespread was the grief in the State of Louisiana has already been emphasized. No one who witnessed it will soon forget the immense concourse from all walks of life and from every portion of the State that gathered in his home city of New Iberia last April to pay him the final tribute of sorrow and respect. The scene at the tomb was memorable and formed a setting worthy of the notable address by the talented and eloquent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], who had been the dead Senator's intimate friend for many years.

Mr. BROUSSARD had a striking and outstanding personality.

Physically he was handsome of countenance, graceful and easy of carriage, and strong of body. His naturally robust constitution had been developed by his love of out of doors, for he was devoted to life in the open. He loved nature and all growing things—trees and plants and flowers. One rarely saw him without a boutonnière in his lapel. He liked all animals, especially horses and dogs, and reveled in the pastimes with which the latter are associated. He was an ardent devotee of the chase and a crack shot. He enjoyed racing—the "sport of kings"—was an excellent judge of horse flesh, and was himself a skilled equestrian.

Mentally he was richly endowed. He had a quick and alert mind, and his powers of absorption and assimilation were particularly keen. Knowing but little of a subject, he could, after hearing others explain it, grasp the salient points and present the proposition as his very own. He had a ready and picturesque flow of language, a pleasing voice, and a graceful delivery, either in the forum or on the hustings.

Socially he was charming. He was naturally companionable. He liked people and liked to mingle with them. One rarely saw him alone. He was an inimitable raconteur, and his fund of clever and witty stories was inexhaustible. He was most adaptable, equally at home in the club, in the drawing room, or with the man on the street.

Such qualities combined in one man were naturally calculated to draw his fellowmen to his support, and it is only truth to tell that his individual following was as large as, if not larger than, any one public man that the State of Louisiana has known in many a decade. Thousands followed his personal and political fortunes blindly and unquestioningly. There was in him something that in other days the "Mill Boy of the Slashes" had, that the "Plumed Knight of Maine" possessed, and that, in our own time, no one would deny to the "Great Rough Rider," too early dead; but unlike them, he never suffered defeat before the people in his near 30 years of public service.

"BOB BROUSSARD" was of Acadian descent, springing from that sturdy stock whose persecutions and wanderings, while saddening the pages of history, have enriched the literature of all times. He was intensely proud of that fact, as well he might, and it made him all the more profoundly attached and loyal to that Louisiana where this race of people finally found an end to its rovings and tribulations—that Louisiana whose civilization has been leavened and broadened by its advent into its confines. For the Acadians brought with them, and ever since their descendants have practiced, the simple, homely virtues of truth and courage and honor and hospitality. Simple virtues, Mr. Speaker, but fundamental qualities, without which no man or people can or do count in the ultimate.

There, in that Acadian country, in its heart, mayhap within sight of the very oak that was to have been the trysting place of the lovers—Gabriel and Evangeline—on the banks of the historic Teche, with its softly moving waters to sing his requiem until time shall be no more, he sleeps. God give him eternal rest.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was a character most extraordinary. Highly educated and speaking two languages with unsurpassed fluency, he possessed a personal charm that was appealing and overpowering. A keen perception of people and conditions, added to an alert intellect and a ready fluency of speech, easily made him a forceful character at home and in Washington. At the time of his death he was the most popular man personally in the public life of Louisiana.

Gracious in manner, trained and skillful in debate, courageous, active, and vigorous in any cause he espoused, he won the admiration of men everywhere. His people loved him and signally honored him at every opportunity.

He is mourned to-day in Louisiana as few men have been mourned. Expressing sincere sympathy to the bereaved family and paying tribute to his memory in this hour of sorrow, I give this my earnest expression of grief in the loss to our State and Nation of a serviceable citizen whose distinguished ability was known and recognized throughout the country.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, when I came to the House as a new Member 14 years ago, one of the first Members with whom I became closely associated was our departed friend, BOB BROUSSARD, of Louisiana. For six years he and I sat side by side, just about where I now stand, when the desks were in the House. I learned to know him intimately and well. I learned not only to have an affection for him as a friend but a very great admiration, which really ripened into love for the man and his many sterling qualities. BOB BROUSSARD could not do a mean or small thing. He was generosity itself; he was the very soul of honor; and he was one of the most human of men it has ever been my pleasure to know. When he died humanity lost a friend. All of us who knew him here felt that we had lost an able, faithful, conservative legislator; a loyal, patriotic public servant, and a staunch, unselfish, devoted friend.

Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that we are privileged to meet a man in whom so many of the virtues are blended as there were in our late associate. As I say, I have been here some 14 years. Many men with whom I have served in this great body have crossed over the river and are resting under the shade of the trees since I first entered this Chamber as a Member. Many of them have gone out from among us and have solved the great mystery. Notwithstanding what may be said about the House of Representatives, it is at last the one great legislative body on this earth, and the men who come here are distinctly representative of the best that there is in the people who send them. BOB BROUSSARD represented to a remarkable degree the highly intelligent, patriotic, lovable people of the State of Louisiana. He was in a large measure their idol, particularly the people in his immediate vicinity, who had known him all of his life. As has just been stated by one of his colleagues, he never met with defeat in a political contest. Knowing him as I did, it would be impossible to conceive how such a man could be defeated at the hands of his people.

We shall no more be greeted in this historic Hall by his ever-present smile; no more shall we here receive his cordial handclasp and look upon his face, which always beamed with brotherly love for his fellows; but let us fervently hope that in the great beyond whither we are all traveling we may again meet and commune with our beloved comrade and friend who has only preceded us to that beautiful land where there is no more of pain, of suffering, of separation, and of death. May the Great Father in His own good time grant unto us a reunion with our genial and lovable friend, BOB BROUSSARD, in "that mansion not made with hands eternal in the heavens."

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, we have met to-day to pay tribute to the memory of one of Louisiana's greatest men, Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD.

As a member of the committee who went upon that sad journey when the remains of Senator BROUSSARD were consigned to their last resting place in the city of New Iberia, La., I could not help but be impressed by the solemn ceremony when his body was laid to rest, and to me it was apparent that the people of Louisiana realized in mourning the loss of Senator BROUSSARD they were mourning the loss of one of Louisiana's finest men, truest citizens, and ablest statesmen.

No public man on the stage of Louisiana's political life has ever controlled as completely as did ROBERT BROUSSARD the friendship and love of his fellow citizens. He never failed a friend and never forgot a favor. His personal magnetism will ever remain the crown of his success in public life. In all his activities, political as well as social, the results are characterized by the same element of humane feelings. He put men and life above the economic materialism which to-day plays so large a part in American life and consciousness. He led the simple life, and he represented his people without the poison of pride or the power of glory. His best weapon in his political battles and successes was his spirit of natural humility and modesty. He felt nature to be the best instructor in life, and he looked with contempt upon shams and pretensions. Under political storm and stress he followed the rules of his manhood and always stood by the dictates of his conscience. He loved the truth; he hated shadows; he always adhered to substances. His whole public career in the House and Senate of the United States reflects his personality. His private life was clean, lovable, and honorable.

ROBERT F. BROUSSARD will go down in the history of his Nation and his State as one of the strongest, one of the most admired, and one of the best loved men who has ever served a people.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I shall make no attempt to recite in detail the facts connected with and making up the interesting and eventful life history of our deceased friend and colleague for whom these services are held; one whom we all delighted to honor while living, and now in sadness and reverence pay deserved tribute to his memory and in some meager way express our appreciation for his distinguished services to our State and country.

Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was known, admired, and loved by Louisianians everywhere, and the immeasurable loss to our State and its people occasioned by his untimely death has been most keenly felt in every section and in each locality.

Just as he had served effectively and unselfishly, with marked ability and exalted patriotism, the people and interests of his native State, guarding with watchful care and working with untiring energy for their advancement and development, so he was held in the universal esteem and affectionate confidence of all.

For many years BOB BROUSSARD was in the foremost rank of the men first in the affairs in Louisiana, and during his service in Congress had attained a standing and reputation that was national.

Independent, fearless, and aggressive, with a fine grasp of public questions, embodying the high ideals that appeal instantly to our people, ready of speech and with a charming personality, he soon rallied to every cause he championed a host of supporters. He was throughout his public career always an important factor in every great issue pertaining to the welfare of the State.

No man who has been a Member of this House ever had a stronger hold on the people of his congressional district. For 18 years he was continuously returned practically without opposition and apparently without any effort on his part except faithful discharge of duty.

A variety of explanations have been given to account for his unbounded popularity in the third Louisiana district and his continued and uninterrupted political supremacy there, one among which has become a tradition throughout the State and has received wide publicity elsewhere. This was that his kinsmen were so numerous, taking in all degrees of cousins, that they held at lease a balance of power in the district, and, all being loyal and devoted to "Couzan Bob" and proud of his distinction, took care that no one should interfere with his political interests or fortunes. If this interesting story were true, no higher tribute could be paid to the memory of any man.

I feel, however, that the true explanation is found in Senator BROUSSARD'S own conception and appreciation of the function, duty, and obligations of a Representative in Congress. To use his own words, I quote:

> The Congressman, and I use the word in its true sense, is but the agent of the people or State which sends him here. The principle, in so far as a Member of the House is concerned, is that those who elect that Member have the right to instruct him in regard to their interests, and the Representative has absolutely no right to act adversely to such interests.

The will of his constituents as expressed to him in respect to their interests and their welfare was supreme authority and binding upon him, and he lived religiously up to this doctrine both in the letter and the spirit.

He worked assiduously and fought with determination for the people and the interests of his congressional district, the source of his commission and authority. No amount or character of criticism could swerve him from this course. Every position of honor or preferment coming with any element inconsistent with what he conceived to be his duty to them was brushed aside.

So, in my humble judgment, his faithfulness and devotion to the people and interests of the district which he represented, coupled with his fine ability to achieve results for them, formed the true basis for his great popularity and political success in Louisiana and served to give him the national prominence which enabled him to more effectively extend his career of usefulness to the needs of his entire State and beyond to the Nation.

While many of his party associates in Louisiana and at Washington differed with him as to some matters of party policy and in respect to what they held to be cardinal party principles, contending that the results which he sought could best be obtained by other methods than those which he felt should guide his course, yet no one ever doubted or questioned the sincerity of his purpose, the purity of his motives, or the high quality of his patriotism.

When he sought the Senatorship he took scrupulous care that his position upon all public questions in relation to which he might be called upon to act should be frankly stated and known to all the people of the State.

There can be no surer or more permanent foundation for enduring fame than that which is established by and results from a record of faithful public service, true to promise and to principle, such as characterized the life and public record of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD.

> Statesman, yet friend to truth! Of soul sincere,
> In action faithful, and in honor clear;
> Who broke no promise, served no private end * * *.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. ESTOPINAL] is unavoidably absent to-day on account of illness. He had prepared some remarks appropriate to this occasion which he sent to me, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, after serving 18 years in this body and three years in the other branch of the Congress of the United States, ROBERT F. BROUSSARD died at the early age of 53. This memorial service under these circumstances carries an added note of sorrow, for experience and the expanded powers of a remarkably fertile mind had equipped ROBERT F. BROUSSARD for a still larger degree of usefulness to his country and his State in the years which, by nature's usual rule, should follow.

The details of the life and public services of our departed friend and colleague have been given so fully and with such sympathetic recognition in the Senate, and here to-day, that I will confine myself to briefly recalling one happy trait which he possessed to a very unusual degree—an unaffected democracy of manner and a simple, natural, and companionable relation with all people.

It is a rather rare man who is not sobered into reserve and formality of manner to some degree by elevation to high office, with its weight of cares and the engrossment of service, on the one hand, and constant and subtle deferences which tend to feed his vanity and enlarge his sense of self-importance on the other. And more than often these influences develop that indefinable and really unnatural mien which is generally mistermed dignity. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD was one of these rare men. He was "Bob" when he began his official career, thus he remained throughout its lengthening years of official honors, and it was "Bob" who was affectionately and tearfully laid to rest in the town in which he was born and raised. His idea of dignity was work well performed and friends made, retained, and unaffectedly enjoyed.

Mr. Speaker, friends are discriminating—even old friends are, perhaps as much as new ones—and it takes solid qualities, real, effective work and accomplishments to satisfy them. These give grace, savor, and power to natural manner. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD measured up to the full expectations of those who put him here and kept him here. He was an able and faithful Representative and Senator.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, Senator BROUSSARD was one of those men whose strong personality, unflinching courage, and great ability commanded the respect even of those who differed with him. But these qualities not only commanded the respect of those who differed with him, but they also invoked from his supporters and friends a zealous attachment that was remarkable.

In a discussion of the character and qualities of Senator BROUSSARD, my good friend, the gentleman from Louisiana, Judge MARTIN, handed me an article by Jules Dreyfus, of New Iberia, La., that expressed in such a fine way the feelings of the people of that great State that I shall confine my tribute to printing, as an extension of my remarks, this tribute from a lifelong friend:

"The demise of United States Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD marked a broad, dark, somber swath across the political horizon of Louisiana.

"He was of unique personality and belonged to a class of his own. From a close survey of the political situation, his successor will fill the vacated Senatorship, but not replace the sympathy, the sincerity, the affection with which his labor has been received and accepted by his constituents.

"That silent, mute bond of love and worship his strenuous work excited during his last days at Washington among his numberless friends and foes will illumine the valley of the dark shadows. His career was meteoric. Some of his political battles had a Napoleonic sweep.

"The struggle for the United States Senatorship against entrenched officialdom reflected a high order of political skill and strategy. A wizard on the stage of the State's public life, his uncanny, mysterious power of hypnotism made him the patron saint of the largest individual following ever recorded. His entrance into public life, especially the beginning of his congressional career, was dramatic in the extreme, if not highly spectacular in some respects. Nominated by one-half vote majority at Morgan City, he at once became a fixed, honored institution in the State's political activities. He weathered all storms and turmoil with unflinching courage and conquered opposition, sometimes defamation and calumny, with such lofty magnanimity that left no scars, no stings. The charm of his manhood, the nobility of a kind, fraternal nature, the spirit of devotion to friends, and the recognition of the rights and privileges of political independence were assets no political expediency and necessity could ever threaten or destroy.

"At Washington he prepared with dogged tenacity to render the yeoman service which posterity and the future historian will recognize as the masterpiece of his life's work. Stalwart in his views on protection, no tariff bill during his term of office at the Capital was ever formulated and submitted to Congress for ratification but bore the imprint of his views and the wisdom of his studies and experience. Having mastered, through close scrutiny and research, the intricate problems of the vexatious sugar questions, he became encyclopedic on the subject and a tower of strength during the precarious, menacing periods blows and assaults were directed against the State's sugar industry. During all these times of stress, uncertainty, and vicissitudes his championship of sugar protection assumed a fervor, a dedication of service which culminated in his political canonization by the democracy of the third district. Changes in Federal administrations, tampering with tariff bills, exploitations of the vagaries of comic economic principles, involving the annihilation or paralization of the sugar industry, never changed his stand, his position. Even at the risk of political ostracism, party expulsion, and savage criticism of a whole small world of bureaucrats, he stood as the rock of ages, the invincible defender on the ramparts fighting libel, repelling economic fetiches, and anarchy. In the United States Senate, as well as the House of Congress, he was recognized as a fearless warrior for the rights, the security, the protection of every sugar planter, of every other industry of the State. He looked upon protection of American labor and manufactures through the eyes of a sire, a prophet. He had no hesitation in the choice of economic policies. He stood unfettered, from party tradition, upon the broad, comprehensive platform which proclaimed the industrial independence, the self-sufficiency, the development of the Nation and its resources. He was no visionary and felt contempt and scorn for the impracticable panaceas projected on the political screen by some misguided, sometimes misled, overzealous leader of the national Democratic organization. The consistency of his immovable stand during his participation in the construction and quadrennial revision of our tariff laws have earned the permanent, deep love, sympathy, and respect of those who looked to him for a solution of that ever-present menace. It has the elements of the fire of fanaticism, the living zeal, the quivering fervor of the crusader. But it is as "Couzan Bob" le roi des Cadiens," "king of the Cajans," that future folklore will remember him, that legend will weave the laurel crown of sanctity. He has, with his own heart, his own lifeblood, created an imperishable shrine to which, for years to come, the stream of Cajan pilgrimage will be directed and the offer of reverence, the humble homage, tenderly deposited.

"No man before him in Louisiana's public life had the sentimental control in as absolute and astonishing a measure over the Creole. He seemed to possess the gift which could read, analyze, and absorb their scars, doubts, humility. With unerring accuracy, the master touch of the prophet, he obtained the unnatural, the supernatural, a complete crystallization of the sorrows, the trials, tribulations, the hopes and ambitions of the Acadian. He appeared as the manifestation of their power, right, and justice, and the height of lofty useful citizenship to which each one could aspire. He transmuted traditional sullenness, hatred, and prejudice into a force of militant brotherhood. He was inspiration and thrill. No audience, however hostile and antagonistic, could long withstand the magic touch. His personal magnetism was phenomenal and a mystery as well as a puzzle to his political rivals. In debates on the hustings, in addresses on the stump, the spontaneous electrification of the phlegm, the apathy, the indifference of the audience was instantaneous. The charm and the virility of his personality remained with him to the end. He had the art, the versatility, the agility, and nobility of mind that rendered his powers of mental penetration an ever-inspiring feature of his nature. This factor rendered, from an ethnographical point of view, the invaluable service that made his coronation as the true apostle of Creolism inevitable. This social achievement, after the effective dissipation of the lingering clouds of distress of a simple, but kind and highly romantic people, still remembering the historical privations and hardships that featured the compulsory exodus of their forebears, will rank with the best work of the great moral and social leaders of our national history and deserve the recognition of the highest authorities in sociology. Many a day will elapse before his people can again tender their hand of friendship to an approximation of what he steadfastly stood and worked for. No public figure in Louisiana to-day can share the exaltation of character, the glorification of principles, the sanctification of efforts which will mark the brightest, the most encouraging pages of a political history replete with service and stirring with sacrifice."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, several Members desired to address the House to-day upon the life and character of Senator BROUSSARD, but are unavoidably absent. I therefore ask unanimous consent that all Members be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE LATE SENATOR JAMES H. BRADY.

Mr. FRENCH assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next order of the day.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 521.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, January 26, 1919, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late a Senator from the State of Idaho.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Idaho.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the uncertainty of the tenure of human life has been most vividly brought to our attention by the numerous deaths in both branches of Congress during the last two years. Since the Sixty-fifth Congress was convened in special session on April 2, 1917, by proclamation of President Wilson, 10 Senators and 13 Representatives have been called over the Great Divide. In no previous Congress, with one exception, has there been such a large mortality.

The State that I have the honor in part to represent has lost two Senators by death during their term, Hon. Weldon B. Heyburn, whose illustrious career is still fresh in the memory of the people, and Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, whose splendid life, high character, and valued public service we have met here to-day to commemorate.

It was my privilege to be intimately acquainted with Senator BRADY and to enjoy his confidence for nearly a score of years. I was closely associated with him in the conduct of four political campaigns in our State and frequently visited him in his home. We shared each others' joys and successes, as well as our sorrows and disappointments, and I speak from personal knowledge of his noble traits of character, his high ideals, and his many attractive personal qualities. Those who are familiar with his record in the Senate are unanimous in their opinion that no more patriotic, conscientious, or industrious man ever occupied a seat in either branch of Congress. He recognized the great responsibility of his position and rejoiced in the opportunity it afforded for real service. His constant thought was as to how he could best contribute to the happiness, prosperity, and contentment of his constituency and the people generally throughout the country.

Hon. JAMES H. BRADY was born in Indiana County, Pa., June 12, 1862, the son of John and Catherine (Lee) Brady, who were of Scotch-Irish descent. His ancestor, Hugh Brady, emigrated to the United States and married Hannah McCormick, and two of their sons distinguished themselves as soldiers. Samuel Brady attained the rank of captain, and his name became a household word for bravery and resourcefulness in Indian warfare in western Pennsylvania during the early years of the Nation. The other son, Hugh Brady, served as a colonel in the War of 1812.

Senator BRADY'S grandfather, James Young Brady, settled on a farm in Indiana County, Pa., and served as a justice of the peace for 43 years. His son John engaged in farming and stock raising in the same county, and later in Marion County, Pa., and finally moved his family to Johnson County, Kans., where he purchased a farm within 20 miles of Kansas City, Mo. Here he became active in politics and held several public positions of honor and trust. He was often called upon to settle disputes among the Kansas pioneers, and was commonly referred to by his neighbors as Judge Brady.

The late Senator attended the public schools of the district and the Leavenworth Normal College. He taught school for three years after receiving his diploma, fitting himself in the meantime for the practice of law. After editing a semiweekly newspaper for two years, he embarked in the real estate business, with branch offices in St. Louis, Mo., Chicago, Ill., and Houston, Tex., in which he was very successful. While thus engaged he became acquainted with the wonderful irrigation and power possibilities of the State of Idaho, and moved there in 1895. He at once became identified with the development of the Snake River Valley, and was the moving spirit in the construction of the Idaho canal, the Marysville canal, and the Fort Hall Indian Reservation canal. He also became interested in the development of water power in southeastern Idaho, and organized the Idaho Consolidated Power Co., which developed the water power at American Falls, from which light and heat were supplied to the surrounding communities.

His activity and long experience in irrigation affairs brought him the position of vice president of the National Irrigation Congress, 1896–1898, and membership on its executive committee, 1900–1904. He was an influential factor in this organization, through whose instrumentality great impetus was given toward securing the enactment of the national reclamation law.

Senator BRADY took an active interest in public affairs from early manhood. The same energy and executive ability which he displayed in his business enterprises distinguished him as an organizer and leader in the Republican Party, and his foresight, business intelligence, personal popularity, and capacity for work became a valuable asset to that party in Idaho soon after he became identified with the State. He was selected as a delegate to the Republican national conventions of 1900, 1908, and 1916. He was chosen chairman of the Idaho delegation to the convention of 1908, and a member of the delegation selected by the convention to notify former President William H. Taft of his nomination at his home in Cincinnati, Ohio.

In 1904 he was selected as chairman of the Republican State Central Committee of Idaho and again selected in 1906 and led his party to victory in both campaigns. He was nominated in convention by acclamation as the Republican candidate for governor in 1908 and was elected November 3 of that year by a magnificent majority.

As governor, Senator BRADY urged the passage of the direct-primary and local-option bills and was largely instrumental in their enactment into law. Among other legislation he advocated and which was enacted during his administration as governor were an amendment of the law regulating the period of employment in underground mines, an employers' liability law, and a law prohibiting wholesale liquor dealers being interested in places doing retail business. Provision was made for the care and protection of orphans and of the homeless, neglected, or abused children, and for the indeterminate sentence of persons convicted of felonies, except treason and murder in the first degree. He advocated many other measures for the advancement of the welfare of the people of the State and contributed privately both time and money to almost every movement which had for its purposes the upbuilding of the State and the development of its resources.

After he retired as chief executive he immediately again turned his attention to the development of the agricultural resources of the State, in which he had been so active before his election. He purchased a large irrigation project near Mountain Home, and at great expense rehabilitated the entire system, which otherwise would practically have been a complete failure and resulted in great loss to the settlers.

With a view of attracting the attention of the eastern people to the opportunities in various lines of endeavor in the West, Mr. BRADY in 1911 arranged for a special train to carry the governors of the northern and northwestern States across the continent, visiting all the principal cities between St. Paul and New York. The organization was known as the "governors' special," and the party was entertained by various cities along the route and by the governors in the central and eastern States. President Taft gave the party a state dinner at the White House, and the various governors in the party were entertained by the respective State delegations in Congress.

In 1912 Mr. BRADY was elected president of the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, the duties of which position occupied much of his time during that year.

The death of Senator Heyburn on October 17, 1912, created a vacancy in the Senate, to which Gov. Hawley appointed Hon. K. I. Perky, to hold until the legislature should elect a successor. Mr. BRADY was a candidate before the legislature, which convened the following January, and several other prominent Republicans also aspired to the position. After 35 ballots, Senator BRADY received a majority on the 24th of January, 1913, and was declared elected for the balance of the unexpired term ending March 4, 1915. He was a candidate to succeed himself and was reelected by the people at the general election in November, 1914, for a full six-year term.

On entering the Senate his success in business affairs and his long experience in handling large enterprises was recognized by the leaders in that body giving him assignments to important committees. He was selected as chairman of the Committee on National Banks and was given membership on Military Affairs, Agriculture and Forestry, Mines and Mining, Public Buildings and Grounds, Conservation of National Resources, and Expenditures in the Department of Commerce.

He brought to his committee work and to his duties on the floor of the Senate a wide and varied knowledge of the legislative needs of the country, which he had gained by his activity in business and politics and as chief executive of his State, which, with his natural enthusiasm and self-confidence, made a most favorable impression on his colleagues and enabled him to accomplish a great deal toward securing their support for the enactment of wise and beneficial legislation of a local and national character.

The advent of the country into the world war made necessary from the day war was declared almost daily meetings of the great Committee on Military Affairs and frequent meetings of the Committee on Agriculture to hear the officers of the Army discuss the country's need of men, munitions, and supplies. Senator BRADY, although then in failing health, regularly attended these meetings, and although his friends and his physicians warned him of the danger to his health by applying himself so constantly to his duties, he could not be dissuaded, insisting that his responsibilities to his country demanded his whole time and thought as much as if he had been assigned to the camp or trench for the performance of military duty.

Senator BRADY earnestly supported legislation for the preparation and conduct of the war, and for making the most liberal provision for the equipment and comfort of the soldiers and the care of their families.

Although a strict party man, no thought of party advantage influenced him in the consideration of legislation pertaining to the conduct of the war. The common interest of all the people impelled him to forget partisanship, and to keep in mind only the one thought, to win the war at any cost.

He was enthusiastic in his support of the Government's plans to assume the large burden our Republic was to bear in the world conflict, and his dying regret was that he could not live to do his part and rejoice in the victory which he felt confident would crown the struggle of his country and her allies to annihilate militarism in Europe and bring a lasting peace to the world.

Senator BRADY'S wide knowledge of business and the agricultural resources of the country made him a valued member of the Agricultural Committee, which had in charge the legislation for the procurement and conservation of the food supply of our allies. He argued successfully that production could be stimulated by a guaranteed market at a fair price, and that when the farmers were appealed to on patriotic grounds they would cheerfully respond by an increased production, and the nonproducers from patriotic motives would conserve food to the limit in order that our soldiers and those of our allies might have an abundance.

The Senator's fondness for companionship and his natural inclination to cooperate with his friends and neighbors in all matters affecting the general welfare of the people are well illustrated by his membership in various fraternal and semi-business organizations. He was a member of the Pocatello Commercial Club, Boise Commercial Club, Salt Lake Commercial Club, Rocky Mountain Club of New York, president of the Western Development Association, president Idaho Children's Home Finding and Aid Society, honorary vice president Panama-Pacific Exposition, chairman advisory board National Council Women Voters, honorary member Grand Army of the Republic, department of Idaho, and honorary member Kansas Historical Society. He was a Woodman of the World, an Odd Fellow, a Mason, an Elk, an Eagle, and a member of the Congregational Church.

Senator BRADY was married to Miss Irene M. Moore in June, 1913, who survives him. He is also survived by two sons by a former marriage, who have inherited many of the fine characteristics which distinguished their father. Until recently the elder son, James Robb Brady, was a publisher of a newspaper at Caney, Kans., and the other son, Samuel Edward Brady, was in the jewelry business at El Reno, Okla., but both have moved to Pocatello since their father's death to be in closer touch with their business interests.

Mr. Speaker, of the many admirable characteristics possessed by the late Senator BRADY I believe generosity was the most conspicuous, and that commendable quality embraces practically all the virtues. Most men ambitious for political, professional, or business success frequently act as if the path to fame and fortune is only wide enough for their own feet. Not so with Senator BRADY. He wanted to make it a great highway and was always willing to lend a helping hand to anybody honestly trying to get a footing there.

There are thousands of men in Idaho to-day who are independent because of substantial assistance and opportunity afforded them by him, and thousands of hearts have been made glad and thousands of homes have been made happier because of his activities. Many young men have been aided by him to secure an education who otherwise would have been handicapped in life's battles, and are now substantial and honored citizens. Is it any wonder that he is mourned by the people of his adopted State, to whom he was so devoted?

Senator BRADY was most deeply interested in every movement intended to advance his home city, and, while he was recognized throughout the State as a public-spirited citizen, his neighbors always had good reason to feel that he had a special interest in Pocatello. He had done much toward its upbuilding and had great plans by which it could be further improved. He always met the most humble of his neighbors with a genial familiarity that made them feel that he was one among them and could be approached without ceremony or embarrassment. He could "walk with kings nor lose the common touch."

Because of his genial manner, he may have been imposed upon occasionally, but a worthy request was never refused.

An incident well illustrating that his great heart overflowed with a kindly sympathy for the unfortunate was related to me by a recipient of his favor, who occupied a lowly position at the Capitol. His married son had fallen into bad company and lost his position and his home had been broken up. The father was in despair as to what he should do to aid his son to get a new start under different environments, and he concluded if he could secure him a position in a distant State through one of the Senators the son would probably reform. Not personally knowing any of the Senators, he told me he observed them day after day entering the Capitol and finally selected Senator BRADY as the one most likely to be easily approached. He asked for an interview, which was granted, and he related his story, which aroused the Senator's interest and sympathy, and he not only secured him employment in his home town, but advanced his railroad fare, amounting to nearly $100. The young man gave splendid satisfaction in his new position and in a few months sent for his wife, and they again established a home.

It has been my good fortune to know many men of high as well as of low estate, but I can truthfully say that I have never known a man who was so solicitous of the happiness and comfort of others as Senator BRADY. Of fine physique and genial manner, he was always the moving spirit in every gathering; courteous, gentle, and dignified, easily winning the confidence and respect of all whom he met.

Mr. Speaker, a wise and useful legislator, a generous and unselfish friend, an eminent and patriotic citizen, has gone from among us. The people of the State he loved so well and served with such faithful and laborious devotion will treasure his memory and strive to imitate his noble virtues and to give to our country that full measure of devotion which constituted the highest distinction of this faithful servant of the people.

The kindly heart of the late Senator is stilled, but he will continue to live in the inspiration which he gave to those with whom he came in contact, and that generous, broad spirit of his will grow and expand through the activity of others inspired by him.

Senator BRADY appeared unafraid to receive the fatal summons. He conducted himself as one conscious of having consistently striven to do his whole duty to his fellow man and his God, and who had the sweet assurance that beyond this life he would enter into another sphere of usefulness and contentment.

Life! we've been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not "Good night," but in some brighter clime
Bid me "Good morning."

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, it was not my pleasure to meet the late JAMES H. BRADY until we both were in Congress, he at the other end of the Capitol. But long before I came to Washington I knew of the distinguished man in whose memory a session of the House of Representatives is now proceeding.

Idaho is one of Colorado's close and splendid neighbors. Neither the vastness of that Commonwealth's resources nor the virtues of her sons are unknown in Colorado. And of her sons not one was better or more favorably heralded than he whose death we mourn.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I always had a feeling that I knew Senator BRADY in a personal way because of the close and cordial friendship which existed between him and Mr. Frank H. Hilliard, near and dear of kin to me. From my relative, who for many years and until recently was a resident of Pocatello, the home city of the late Senator, I learned of Mr. BRADY's admirable qualities and came to know of the hold which he had on the good people who delighted to honor him. If I were not prompted by other and sufficient considerations, as I am, Mr. Speaker, the friendship to which I have referred would make it incumbent on me to add my testimony to the substantial worth and the distinguished and disinterested service of Mr. BRADY.

The subject of my remarks was not born in Idaho, neither did he go there in the early days. Not the fetish of nativity, therefore, nor the glory of pioneering accounted for his prominence. Simply through sturdy manhood and intellectual and practical grasp of the needs of the people did Senator BRADY's triumphs come. Elevation to high political honors is achieved by no man save through the expression of the people's choice on occasions when the sovereign electors make selections of their public servants. In instances men have been chosen to office as the result of aiding and altogether extraneous circumstances, without which the electors favoring would not have sufficed. Men so chosen have all the rights and legal enjoyments of men more freely chosen. But Senator BRADY won because of the very love for him which the populace had in their hearts. This heart devotion in his lifetime has become heart memory in his death.

Daniel Webster may not have done so, but no admirer of that remarkable statesman would wish that he did not write the little poem often attributed to him, entitled:

THE MEMORY OF THE HEART.

If stores of dry and learned lore we gain,
We keep them in the memory of the brain.
Names, things, and facts, whate'er we knowledge call,
There is the common ledger for them all.
And images on this cold surface traced
Make slight impressions and are soon effaced.
But we've a page more glowing and bright,
Whereon our friendships and our loves to write.
That these may never from the soul depart,
We trust them to the memory of the heart.
There is no dimming, no effacement there;
Each new pulsation keeps the record clear.
Warm, golden letters all the tablets fill,
Nor lose their luster till the heart stands still.

The people not alone of Idaho but of the entire West, Mr. Speaker, mourn this good man. His leadership meant so much to them, his counsel was so comforting, and his sympathies so embracing. Other men will follow him as earlier ones preceded, but his place will never be filled.

The Congress of the United States, in the midst of present trials unprecedented and most difficult, and facing conditions that only the stoutest-hearted and altogether faithful can view with calmness of spirit, more and more will miss his wise counsel, his perfect poise.

The wife of his bosom and the family of his hearthstone—what of comfort, of joy, of sunshine does the world hold for them? What can man say to those sorrowing ones?

Lord Tennyson voiced, oh, so keenly and so adequately, the impelling grief and the insuperable difficulty in the lines—

Break, break, break,
On thy cold gray stones, O Sea!
And I would that my tongue could utter
The thoughts that arise in me.

O, well for the fisherman's boy,
That he shouts with his sister at play!
O, well for the sailor lad,
That he sings in his boat on the bay!

And the stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill;
But O for the touch of a vanish'd hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!

Break, break, break,
At the foot of thy crags, O Sea!
But the tender grace of a day that is dead
Will never come back to me.

But in more hopeful and comforting words, and long before Tennyson was born, the psalmist sang:

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.
He maketh me to lie down in green pastures;
He leadeth me beside the still waters.
He restoreth my soul;
He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake.
Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death,
I will fear no evil,
For Thou art with me;
Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me.
Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies;
Thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.
Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life;
And I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

Mr. Speaker, high as were the honors which Mr. BRADY enjoyed, and striking as were his achievements, still his ideals were never fully attained. His philosophy of life and service spurred him to the utmost, but he appreciated the weakness of man and of man government. Knowledge that the wagon is never driven to the star did not tempt him to desist in the effort. His star was justice to humanity, his wagon the chariot of service to his kind on earth.

He lived a full life and a useful one. His successes offered him opportunity to work for his fellows; his failures hallowed his soul for efforts anew.

I have read in a grand old story
That is lost beyond recall,
That the sweetest song of the singer
Has never been sung at all.

That ever before the painter,
Like a mist cloud soft and faint,
Floats a fairer, sweeter picture
Than ever his brush can paint.

That deep in the soul of the sculptor,
Seen by his eyes alone,
Sleeps the perfect form of the angel
In the uncarven stone.

I know that the dreams that are fairest
Have never yet come true,
For they melt away in the morning
Like sparkling drops of dew.

But the song of the singer was sweeter
For the one that he might not sing,
And the painter caught some tintings
From the glint of the dream dove's wing.

Our days would often be dreary
Were it not for the flitting dream,
And the lives we live are the better
For the surge of the pent-up stream.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, on the invitation of my colleagues, BURTON L. FRENCH and ADDISON T. SMITH, the able and faithful Representatives in this House from the State of Idaho, I avail myself of the privilege and honor to offer tribute to the memory of their beloved Senator, JAMES H. BRADY, who, with six other Senators—Messrs. Jacob H. Gallinger, of New Hampshire; William Hughes, of New Jersey; Ollie M. James, of Kentucky; Robert F. Broussard, of Louisiana; William J. Stone, of Missouri; and Benjamin R. Tillman, of South Carolina; as well as 12 Representatives—Messrs. E. R. Bathrick, of Ohio; J. H. Capstick, of New Jersey; D. W. Comstock, of Indiana; J. H. Davidson, of Wisconsin; H. T. Helgesen, of North Dakota; E. J. Hill, of Connecticut; W. A. Jones, of Virginia; Charles Martin, of Illinois; Jacob Meeker, of Missouri; J. A. Sterling, of Illinois; C. A. Sulloway, of New Hampshire; and J. F. Talbott, of Maryland—passed away during the year 1918. This long roll of our honored dead who were Members of both Houses of Congress is proof of the hard service and trying labors of those who are commissioned by the people to meet and discharge the many difficult problems of official work and legislation during one of the most trying periods in the history of our country.

In this list of public servants Idaho gave to the Nation a faithful, industrious, and patriotic American in the person of Senator JAMES H. BRADY. His five years of devoted service in the United States Senate were but a repetition of his splendid record of fidelity and efficiency as chief executive of the sovereign State of Idaho. This plain, honest, hard-working, enterprising, generous, self-made man left behind an enviable record, not only in his distant home in the far-away Rocky Mountains, but here in the Capital City of the Republic; he soon won the confidence, respect, good will, and admiration of his colleagues in the Senate, also of the Members of this House who had the good fortune to know him.

The life and career of Senator BRADY is full of hope, encouragement, and inspiration to the American youth. He began his useful and successful career as a Kansas school-teacher. Then journalism appealed to him, and from that fascinating occupation he entered the real estate business, and then came the lure of the inviting West and a new home amid the beautiful mountains of Idaho, famed for its wonderful mineral resources of gold, silver, and copper, a rich and virgin soil, its wealth of undeveloped water power, and its matchless scenic beauties. Here in this promised land he made his way into the heart and affections of the people, because he was a man, a true man, as we say, honest as the days are long, generous to a fault, wearing his heart upon his sleeve, a friend to the friendless, a public benefactor, a faithful, incorruptible official. He was unselfish, public-spirited, and worked unceasingly for the development and prosperity of his adopted State and the welfare and happiness of its grateful people.

Idaho never had a governor more deeply concerned or more active in the promotion of her material, agricultural, educational, civic, and moral development. In the United States Senate he soon won high rank as an active, industrious, and influential Member. The suggestion of legislation for the good of the people, for the industrial welfare of the Nation, for the protection and safety of our Government at home and from foreign enemies had his unwavering support.

In the Senate Committee on Military Affairs he was awake to the needs of the hour in fully and effectually preparing the Nation to enter the great world war, and there, as elsewhere, did his full duty as a loyal, patriotic statesman.

As a member of the Republican Party he was as useful and as valuable as in his business and official life. He served as chairman of the Republican State committee for four years, and as chairman of the Idaho State delegations aided in nominating and electing Roosevelt and Taft in their successful campaigns for the Presidency.

It is a labor of love for me in this simple, brief, but sincere way to offer my tribute of respect and admiration to the memory of this fallen statesman from the great West, who will live long in the hearts and affections of the people of Idaho and will be remembered by his countless admiring friends throughout the Republic.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, several Members have been detained and are unable to be present. I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD; also that I may be permitted to insert in the RECORD some tributes from different associations and some editorial comments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, a great ruler in the East many years ago desired to honor the wisest and best man in his empire by conferring upon him the Order of the Golden Crescent. In order to determine who should be so honored, the Sultan sent men throughout his country to find who was most beloved and honored among his subjects.

These couriers returned to the capital with two men. They were unable to determine which of the two was most loved by the people. The two men were then examined by the wisest followers of the Sultan's court. These judges themselves could not agree. In their opinion the two men were equally beloved, equally wise, equally helpful and useful in their association with the people among whom they lived. Much perplexed, the judges took the men before the Sultan himself and stated that they could not decide who should receive the great honor he was ready to confer.

The Sultan examined the men and had great difficulty in determining which one should receive the Order of the Crescent. At last he said to them, "Show me your hands." Now, the hands of the one were white, symmetrical, refined. They had regular lines and were perfect in their beauty and elegance. The hands of the other were large and awkward and red. Knotted with toil, they seemed to have grown out of shape, as if always fitted to bear heavy burdens.

The wise Sultan at once pinned the Golden Crescent upon the breast of the latter man, saying, "This man hath seen human service. The other hath only recommended it."

Gentlemen of the House, if any man here feels that his contribution to the life and happiness and well-being of his country has been greater than that of Senator JAMES H. BRADY, if he feels that he should receive higher honors or greater distinctions than this man, whose name we honor to-day, I should like to say to him, "Show me your hands, and let it be determined how much you have worked for the welfare of your fellow men."

JAMES H. BRADY was a worker with his hands. Powerful of physique, blessed by nature with a perfect constitution, he was one of those great-hearted, restless spirits who assisted to build up an empire of States from that desolated region which was once rightly called the Great American Desert. Senator BRADY was born in the East—we men of the West are usually proud of our eastern family trees—but his full measure of usefulness could not be realized until he had, with naked hands, grappled the great problems of the sterile, barren western plains and made the desert to blossom as the rose.

Senator BRADY, besides being a man of powerful physique and boundless energy, was also a man of unusual business sagacity and sound judgment. He had faith in the West. The West is strewn with the wreckage of men who could not quite conquer our limitless expanse of sterile soil and sun-baked plain. The monotony of the solitudes frequently conquered and defeated high resolve. The limitless expanse of cold gray sage has at times crept like a ghost into the sturdy hearts of men and caused them to despair of redeeming the desert. These things added together did not destroy the faith of Mr. BRADY in the future of the intermountain country. He was gifted with the genius of success. His vision always saw past the difficulties and barriers of the desert and reached beyond into the glories of the promised land.

It was this quality in his nature which enabled him, where others had failed, to see the possibilities of harnessing the great Snake River and converting its tumbling torrent into the ready servant of thousands of homes. It enabled him to take hold of vast irrigation projects where others had failed, and divert life-giving water onto barren, thirsty soil, making other thousands of happy homes.

These enterprises made him eventually a powerful figure in the business and finance of his State. Among the larger financial circles of the West he was as well known probably in Salt Lake City and in Utah as he was in Idaho. As governor of that State, he became a conspicuous figure wherever the interests of the West were discussed, and his counsel was a potent influence in determining the policy of our part of the country on great national questions.

It was the logical thing that he should have found himself at last as the representative of his State in the Senate of the United States. He died at a time when his influence and counsel could be ill spared to the West and to the Nation, and when naturally we felt there were many years of useful, helpful service before him.

I do not believe such a life can end with death. It can not be so. The memory of his sterling honesty, his dauntless courage, his genial disposition remains behind. These things will endure after his body has returned to dust. The spirit is more enduring than the memory of man, because it is immortal and merely goes out of this life to the accomplishment of a greater mission, which the inscrutable hand of God directs in "the undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns."

There is no death! What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call Death.

In that great cloister's stillness and seclusion,
By guardian angels led,
Safe from tempation, safe from sin's pollution,
He lives whom we call dead.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, whose untimely death we mourn to-day, was a product of that part of the country we call the great Northwest. Like most other men, however, who have reached prominence in that great Northwest territory, he was born elsewhere and was an adopted citizen of the State of Idaho. Born, as I understand, in the State of Pennsylvania, he went as a child to the State of Kansas and there grew to manhood. In the year of 1895 he took up his residence in the State of Idaho. His talents as a business man and as a leader in politics soon made themselves manifest, and he became a leader among his people. As a business man he was painstaking, thorough, untiring, and, as a result, eminently successful. Up to the date of his entrance into the State of Idaho that State had been looked upon largely as a mining Commonwealth. He believed that if water could be put upon the parched soil of its hills and valleys it could be made a great agricultural State, and he became interested in irrigation. In short, he became an authority upon that subject and demonstrated the feasibility of his theories by making a success of large irrigation projects in that State. His people soon recognized his qualifications as a builder and constructionist and made him their governor, and subsequently sent him to the United States Senate. He came to Washington particularly equipped to discuss and legislate upon subjects that particularly pertained to his State and to that section of the country contiguous thereto. He had not long been a member of the United States Senate until his colleagues began to recognize in him that sound business capacity which was so well known among his constituents and which had persuaded them to confer upon him the highest honors within their gift, both in party and State council. Always a party man, he was seldom or never a partisan. He was on all occasions able to place the welfare of his country above the welfare of his party.

Senator BRADY was a modest man. He was seldom heard on the floor of the Senate, though when he did speak he was given the undivided attention of his colleagues. Those who knew him best and are probably best qualified to speak say that he was an untiring worker in committee, that no subject under discussion failed to receive his grave and serious attention, and that his talents were such that he was able to master the questions.

He was looked upon as a solid, practical, substantial citizen and legislator; industrious, vigilant, painstaking, and conscientious. He loved his country and his State, appreciated the dignity of the duties of the high positions to which his people had called him, and at all times reflected credit upon himself, the State he represented, and the Nation.

I pay my tribute of respect to his memory. His State and Nation could ill afford to lose him. His services to his country will long be remembered and appreciated by a grateful people.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] expressed to me his keen regret that he could not be present with us to-day to participate in these memorial services, and he asked that he be given consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Also, I am in receipt of a telegram from Representative MCARTHUR, of Oregon, advising me from New York City that he has been detained and can not reach here in time to participate in these services. He asks also that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, the East unites with the West in paying tribute to an illustrious son of the West. The Empire State, whose shores are washed by the boisterous waves of the Atlantic, joins with the States where are heard the peaceful murmurs of the Pacific. Together we are here to offer a wreath to the memory of a son of Idaho, the late Senator JAMES H. BRADY. A wreath; a thought. Each petal of that memory's wreath is a thought for the sterling qualities of the man.

Everyone who knew him tells of those qualities which not only contributed to his individual success, but which he in turn contributed to the welfare of his State and of the Nation. Each petal a thought! A successful career; a robust character; conscientious attention to duties well performed; untiring industry; generous both with his means and in his willingness to understand the viewpoint of others; and always a thorough American, a splendid type of the man who, born in the East, was developed in the West, and who helped to develop the West.

Oh, I have liked to travel in the West. Many has been the time when, leaving the Atlantic and traveling to the Pacific, I have realized the buoyant feeling in the western atmosphere. The soul seems to expand with a sense of freedom and with a better knowledge of the greatness of our Republic. And I say to myself, I am really in America. We thus come to know more of our own country. I have had little sympathy with those of my friends in New York who by choice have traveled easterly across the Atlantic before journeying westerly to the Pacific.

And so I once said to my only son, whose life has been given in this war, some day I would take him to Europe, but he would see his own country first. The time came when we traveled in Europe, but first we visited every State in this great Union. On the top of Mount Shasta we once slept all night—or tried to sleep—and in the early morning from the top of that great sentinel we viewed the glories of the hills and plains to the east, brilliantly lighted by the rising sun, even while it was still darkest night in the valleys toward the west. And for more than a thousand miles in the high Sierras we traveled mule back over mountain trails. We visited the people in the cities and on the ranches. Oh, we came to know this Republic of ours, this great United States of America, and we came to appreciate the heroic qualities of the people of the West, who were having so much to do with a development which in time must shape the destiny of the Nation. We learned to love the Americanism of the West. In the West we felt as if we had reached the very heart and soul of America, expansive in its energies, keeping true faith to our ideals, boundless in the possibilities of the future.

Thus I came to envy the men of the West, a West which aided in developing the man and was aided by the man's development. Yes; I have envied. But also I have honored. And, therefore, I from the East am here to join with those who knew him best to honor the memory of a true and a splendid typical son of the West, a son of Idaho, a loyal citizen of the Republic.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, for two terms a Senator from the State of Idaho, twice governor of that mountain Commonwealth, happens to have been my oldest friend and acquaintance in the Congress of the United States and in the city of Washington. As I listened to the eulogies so eloquently delivered and so justly deserved there came to my mind the recollection of the day I first saw him, 39 years ago next June or July, at a teachers' institute at Abilene, Kans. Of all the young people there assembled—and I think perhaps he was the youngest, then a boy of 18—he happens to be the only one whose figure is fixed in my memory as he sat there, and yet I doubt if anyone at that time would have selected him as the one who would be honored here to-day as a great Senator of the Republic of the United States.

His father and mine half a century ago were farmers in Johnson County, Kans., his father, I think, being a county commissioner. His brother, Hon. J. Leeford Brady, was the Republican nominee for Congress in 1912 in the district which I now have the honor to represent. Sometime in the seventies our fathers removed to the far West, then in Kansas, in Dickinson County, and were both farmers and business men there. Mr. BRADY came to this teachers' institute a boy of about 18, tall, vigorous, and, as I recall him, apparently older than I now find he was. He had not had the advantages of school in a city, a town, or even a village, and was not as familiar with the books as were most of those who were there. I remember that some of the older teachers, and practically all of them were older, listened with curiosity to some of his remarks and suggestions; but I think that he exhibited immediately, and thereby attracted and fixed my attention, the qualities that made him great and successful, an interest in all about him, a willingness to mingle in the fray.

He was a man of rare imagination, of the imagination of genius, a man who had in him the spirit of adventure. He was not familiar with much of life then, and only gradually became acquainted with its conditions; but I do not think JIM BRADY ever saw anything that scared him. He was always willing to take a chance. He was a man of such excellent natural business sagacity that his imagination very seldom ran away with his judgment, although in his earlier days he did occasionally ride to a fall. He was first a school-teacher, and a not particularly studious one as I recall him, nor very much interested in the mere business of teaching, but always interested in human nature. He next ran a little paper in a very small village, with no great success nor with any failure. Then he turned to real estate, and he sought there an outlet for his restless ambitions. The country was growing rapidly, and this was the readiest opening for activity. He was from the first, as the gentleman from Idaho has suggested, associated with the land, born and raised on a farm, and from his earliest infancy familiar with the trials and struggles of the farmer people in the great West. In our county the farmers then lived in little dwellings of two and three rooms, such as his folks probably had up on Chapman Creek, and many lived in sod houses, and sometimes in dugouts. They were laying the foundation of the greatest agricultural empire the world ever saw. Their advance guard displaced the Indian. Their tables were supplied from the buffalo. To-day in that country you ride for miles between long rows of trees and hedges, marking out farms the Nile never surpassed. They live in handsome homes, with every modern convenience. They take their families in great automobiles and are 100 miles away along perfect roads sooner than they would have reached the county seat in BRADY's day and mine.

In those days the farmer who had a team of his own, all paid for, was very fortunate. Probably BRADY's family had only one team, and very likely that was under mortgage, as were the teams of most of the rest of the farmers of that community. Very likely they went into debt for the seed wheat that they first put into the ground. I presume BRADY's father's corn crops were generally under mortgage, like most of the rest of us. They tell us that necessity is the mother of invention, and in the early days necessity always camped on JIM BRADY's trail. As a real estate agent in a little village of 200 or 300 and then of perhaps 1,200, in which we both lived for many years, he was not at first peculiarly successful. His feet were on the ground, but his surroundings were rather diminutive for a man of his breadth of character. Finally he made a leap in the dark which astonished the community and marked the genius of the man. No other man could have conceived, no other man have carried out, the projection. Unknown and without means he went down to the headquarters of the Santa Fe Railroad at Topeka and made a contract with the land department of that road by which they sold to him a very large tract of land. The Government had vested in the Santa Fe very extensive areas along its line for many, many miles from Kansas City west. Much of it was still unsold. BRADY went down there and with a ready tongue and an unshaken nerve convinced them that he was the man who could handle some of that land, and they sold him, I think, 20,000 acres of railroad land practically in one body. He made the first payment, very likely most of it on borrowed money, but in a few weeks he disposed of that whole area to some company that he had organized or became acquainted with, a band of capitalists, I think, at Chicago, and at one fell swoop he cleaned up, I think, $40,000. This in those days was an enormous sum, and is a great sum yet if men are reasonable. Jay Gould could have done no more in that environment.

With that capital he started to enlarge and spread out his visions of life and his attempts and ventures. At first, as I said, he made a stumble or two and he lost here and there. He became a little dissatisfied with the opportunities in a little town of 1,200, or by this time 2,000, and for some time he established his headquarters in the city of Chicago. He ventured into various speculations throughout the West, and finally ran across this opportunity in Idaho, and settled in that State. He exemplified there his foresight as a business man, his sagacity as a developer of western enterprise along the lines suggested by the gentleman from Utah. He was a community maker, a leader of men. He built a great irrigating ditch there through a territory that he had acquired. I think somebody else had attempted it and had not been successful. His venture became very successful. He was undoubtedly one of the most useful men that the West ever produced, for his success was not builded upon the downfall of somebody else nor acquired by the ruin of some rival, but he opened there in the mountains a broad area of irrigated country that made homes possible for many other men. He earned his money in a useful and honorable way and became a millionaire. He lived here in Washington in one of the finest mansions in this city. When I first knew him he was not very much addicted to politics and a little cynical and pessimistic about politicians, though he was always interested in a few friends who were candidates, but not very active in politics himself. The little city of Abilene, in which he and I resided in those days, produced two very famous United States Senators, Mr. BRADY being one of them. His associate from Idaho in the Senate was Senator BORAH, who also came from our State. It is a little singular that Kansas should have equipped Idaho with two such distinguished and valuable statesmen. The delegation stood as high as any in the Senate.

His money was made by intelligent and helpful development of opportunities for other men as well as for himself.

Then he turned, somewhat naturally, I can see now, to public life. He was a keen, alert, ambitious man, always vigorous, and never dominated by surroundings, but always ready to dominate his surroundings. He was a friendly man with a warm grasp, a generous heart, and a kindly word for everybody, never seeking to attain success by injuring some one else, but rather by developing something which was generally beneficial and from which a benefit would accrue to him.

When I came here to the House I was a bit surprised to discover the height to which he had risen. I knew that Senator BRADY was a man of ability and force of character, but, somewhat to my astonishment, I learned that he was very familiar with the rules of the Senate; that he had interested himself in them and had acquired a very considerable proficiency in them. Frequently I have gone over there and found him in the chair of the presiding officer of the Senate, in the seat of the Vice President of the Republic, presiding with dignity over its deliberations, to the general satisfaction of everybody in that body. I do not see how anybody could have been more familiar than he was with the routine of Senate business. When I would step in and ask him what was going on, he could always tell me, and he could generally forecast what the decision of the Chair was going to be on a point of order, or what the outcome of any vote would be upon any project before the Senate. Without question he was an industrious, hard-working, and useful Senator of the Republic, well worthy to sit in the Chamber where once Webster and Clay and Calhoun were great leaders.

He was not as eloquent a speaker as some, nor as frequent a speaker, but his ideas were good, his industry was great. I do not know that I ever saw BRADY when he was as much interested in anything or as much elated by anything as he was by the opportunity that was to have been afforded him in the next Senate if he had lived, and as he hoped at that time, to be chairman of the great Committee on Military Affairs, and his heart seemed to be set upon that position. Of course, that would have been the highest point to which he had yet climbed, and his imagination spread out before him golden opportunities to which he never before had aspired. And I may say right here and now, in the 38 years in which I knew him I can not remember any Kansan who traveled as far or climbed as high as he or more worthily either in business or public service. He had set his heart on living to the time when he should be chairman of the Military Committee, which position he would have occupied in the next Congress. He was not unfamiliar with the fact that he was treading close to the heels of death. Once before he told me, the last time I talked with him, that he had gone pretty near to the deep waters, somewhere in Florida, I believe, but said now he thought he had fully recovered and his health was restored.

He had an interesting pair of boys in our little city, very fine young men, and the last time I saw him he spoke with pride and satisfaction of them. They were both good, sensible, successful young men, of whom any father might well be proud.

It is a great pleasure to remember that after I had been here a few months and we began to recall our old acquaintance and friendship, he said to me, "We must keep in touch with each other; we can do each other good, and in that way help our constituents." I found he was a helpful man to me, and that I could ascertain from him what was going on or what would be the probable result of any given discussion, debate, or procedure in any given legislation in the Senate. BRADY was a man of big business. I am satisfied that he was what is called a genius, and genius consists largely of imagination, of foresight, and courage. He never feared to make an attempt. His imagination could always drive through the clouds, and he could gaze into the future and see things that the dull, plodding, industrious man could never comprehend.

I could see that as they smiled at him in the teachers' institute, a boy of 18, it was because he was ignorant of and laughed at some of the set rules of the teachers. He had outstripped them in imagination, and, while he had not landed quite high enough to be always accurate, it was the forerunning of the time when through his efforts and business training he would be a United States Senator. For the same reason that he ventured out into the deep waters of a little teachers' institute, which lasted only a month—for that same reason he became a great Senator and a great millionaire, because he had a mind of his own to conceive and a spirit to execute.

He started 35 years ago in our little village with an empty satchel and a red necktie, and when he passed away JIM BRADY died in a Senator's honored toga and left behind him a millionaire's estate, worthily won by honorable means. I can not imagine how a career could ever be more satisfactory. I can not think of any more typical American career, one that better points out the road to success, if you are not afraid to try and if you have the courage to attempt that which you have dreamed. And yet if we had told him that he was a dreamer he would have been the most surprised man in the world.

I do not think he took much interest in poetry or fiction, except casually, and he would have been amazed if anyone told him that he had great imagination. But that was the secret of his success, the ability to imagine and the disposition to put his dreams on trial. Now he has fought his fight, a good fight, and finished his course. He sleeps with Seward, Sumner, and Chase, with Blaine, Conkling, and Ingalls, and among the people from whom he sprang. The tomb is the only real republic. Millionaire and mendicant, sultan and slave, sage and simple, saint and sinner, Kitchener and kaiser, all rest side by side. The Senate has adjourned forever for that deft mind, that strong hand.

JIM BRADY has gone. Almost 40 years have come and passed since he and I became acquainted. Of all of the men who began to be connected with public life in our early days he and I were almost the only ones left anywhere in the public service. The clouds begin to gather about me. Only four months ago Death knocked at my door and went by for a while. When my village companion passes away and leaves behind him a great fortune and great name, when I see this career terminated which well might have lasted 20 years longer, my mind recurs to the days of our youth, of our eager ambitions, of our early struggles side by side on unconquered prairies. Senator JAMES H. BRADY has entered the great congress of all nations, climes, and peoples. As I stand here in the Halls of the Congress of earth's mightiest Republic and pay this tribute to his memory—

I feel like one
Who treads alone
Some banquet hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Representative SMITH of Idaho, and our other colleague, Col. LITTLE, the lifelong friend of Senator BRADY, have outlined so clearly and sympathetically the details of the life of him whom we desire to honor in these services that I shall not attempt to add thereto.

However, the admiration I bore Senator BRADY and the homage I would pay his memory make it impossible for me to omit to refer to a few of the outstanding elements of his character and to a few of his achievements that gave him a conspicuous place in public life and in the Northwest.

A MAN OF VISION.

We remember John Winthrop and Roger Williams and Penn and Oglethorpe because they were men of vision. The shores whereon they landed, to the eyes of almost all other people of their day, were bleak and barren and repelling. To these men of vision they were shores of grandeur, possessed of ample harbors, shores leading back to splendid fields, bounteous gardens, towns and cities, schools and churches and colleges, and a mighty population of God-fearing, industrious men and women.

Unimaginative neighbors of John Harvard and Elihu Yale could see only crude buildings, a few old books, an austere minister or teacher, but Harvard and Yale could see more than that. They could see rough grounds converted into inviting campus; they could see quaint old log buildings and rough-hewn stone structures give way to spacious halls, commodious lecture rooms, ample dormitories, and well-equipped libraries, and they could see thousands of earnest young men and women repairing to the institutions that bear their founders' names, as to living fountains, partaking thereof, and going forth to lead on and to be the agencies of business and culture and learning and inspiration of a mighty age.

The painting in the corridor just outside the Chamber in which we are assembled, called "Westward Ho," always has had for me peculiar fascination. There, in graphic manner, is told the story of the building of the West—the ox team, the canvas-covered wagon, the sturdy father, the dauntless mother with babe upon her breast, the willing and confiding children, the expanse of rough mountains to be overcome, rivers to be crossed, hardships to be endured. There is a picture that has been lived 10,000 times and more in the building of the West. It is a picture of men and women of vision.

In our great West it is to the men and women of vision we look as we search out the heroic leaders upon whom turned the development of mighty States—the pioneers. Such were the husband and wife who with family dependent upon them hewed down the forest and made fields, blazed trails and made highways, withstood hardship, endured privations, erected homes, builded schoolhouses and churches and colleges. Among them, too, were those who seemed to possess peculiar force of character, organization ability of rare degree, and that vision that enabled them to render conspicuous service to mankind as empire builders.

James J. Hill was such a man as he visioned and then built a roadway into the great Northwest. Frank H. Buhl was such a man as he made reality the dream of years that gardens should grow in desert waste. JAMES H. BRADY was such a man as in the valleys of south Idaho, with vision that you and I did not have and with organization ability of high order, he builded irrigation works and took waters from their beds where for centuries they had flowed and transformed the desert into a rich and bounteous garden, within whose bounds the thousands of happy homes to-day bear living witness of his service. But our man of vision saw more than that. The rushing, turbulent water that to you and me was beauty or madness or rhythm, depending upon our mood, was all that to JAMES H. BRADY. And it was more. To him it was light, it was heat, it was energy, and it was in a country that was bare of forests and that seemed not to be a storehouse of coal or other fuel. And so his genius converted the rushing waters into light and heat for the home and the business, into energy for industry, and gave an object lesson that has been and will be followed in the utilization and conservation of the natural resources that God has given. So, first of all, I think of JAMES H. BRADY as a man of vision a builder whose work will go on and on until countless thousands will be his beneficiaries.

THE PUBLIC MAN.

Differing from most men who attain great success in business, JAMES H. BRADY took the citizen's proud part in public life. A Republican, a delegate time and again to State and national conventions, State chairman of his party, president of Trans-Mississippi Congress, governor of Idaho, United States Senator. From that summary may be gathered the abiding interest in public affairs of our late colleague. And in each capacity what Senator BRADY accomplished and what he stood for would require more time to tell than is permitted here. It may be known at once that a man whose ideals were so in harmony with the best in citizenship, a man so unaccustomed to loitering along the way, a man so virile, so capable, would be at work and would add strength to the matters with which he had to do.

He was a man of convictions, yet fair to his opponent and, least of all, not a bigot. He stood for Republican policies in general; he stood for the direct primary; he stood for woman suffrage; he stood for prohibition, and one of the last acts of his life was in behalf of the national prohibition amendment; he believed in recognizing new problems and meeting them with modern ways of thought.

RESPONSIBILITY OF A PUBLIC MAN.

Always an interesting question in connection with the responsibility of public office in a country such as ours is the degree of responsibility to be assumed by the public official. How closely shall he translate into laws, for instance, if he be a member of a legislative body, or into acts if he be an executive, that which he knows to represent at a given moment the sentiment of the people? Or how steadfastly shall he stand against public sentiment when he is convinced it is wrong?

When Talleyrand told Napoleon that there was greater wisdom in France than his, and in reply to Napoleon's interrogation, "Where?" replied, "With the people," he recited a great truth. Yet how literally shall it be applied?

In every position of responsibility this question over and over again must be met. How do conscientious and practical men meet it? One of a thousand other men maybe could have been chosen to a given office who would have filled it as ably and as well as the one selected. Yet he was not chosen. The one who was chosen, like the man in the jury box, has had special reason and duty to hear the evidence, all of it. Then shall the man in the jury box be asked to render a verdict that reflects not his idea but the sentiment of the spectators who fill the court chamber, or shall he hold to the evidence and follow his own conscience? There is but one answer. He is trusted with a special responsibility and must meet it. The responsibility is his.

The same, in my judgment, is true of the man in public life. True he must represent his people. He unconsciously draws inspiration from their thoughts and their judgments; he is modified by them just as a juror in his ideals of right and wrong, of evidence, of credibility of witnesses; is unconsciously modified by the ideals of the community that is his home.

Just such a question Senator BRADY was compelled to meet when the bill providing for the establishment of the selective-draft system of raising an army, instead of the volunteer system, was before the Congress.

If I were to judge from the letters that I received from the people of Idaho during the time this measure was pending, I would be satisfied that the people, generally speaking, were in favor at the time of the volunteer system. I would suppose that the correspondence of the people of the State with Senator BRADY would indicate the same. Yet Senator BRADY was compelled, in obedience to his conscience, after he studied over the problem of what would be best for our Nation, to support the policy of raising an army by application of the selective-draft principle.

A crisis was upon our world; our country's future was in the balance; civilization was at stake, and who will say that it was not the greatest patriotism, the noblest service of every person trusted with responsibility to help to shape our laws in line with the dictates of conscience.

If by following that course the Members of Congress were compelled to adopt the selective-draft system, well did they do their duty. My own judgment is that within a year we had twice as large an Army as we would have had under the volunteer system, unless the people had resorted to more coercive and severe measures than were resorted to by the Government in the raising of the Army. More than that, there is no doubt in my mind that the burden of responsibility has fallen more equitably upon our people than it could possibly have fallen under the volunteer system.

That this view of the question dominated the mind of Senator BRADY I have no doubt, and I have no doubt that the people of the State of Idaho whom he represented, even long before his death, had come to approve the very position that he took and gladly would have placed their stamp of affirmation upon his course on this great subject if the question could have been referred to them again.

THE SUPREME SACRIFICE.

In meeting his task Senator BRADY knew that he was not a well man, yet he was upon important committees. The most important, as I regard it, was the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, which had to do with the shaping of the laws necessary to the mobilization of the man power of our people. True, this responsibility was upon the whole committee, and a man of less earnestness and less dogged determination to do his part could well have permitted the burden of work to rest upon other shoulders.

It is but just to Senator BRADY to recount that during the trying days when large measures were being considered, when the counsel of studious men was most of all desired, Senator BRADY remained at his post of duty, not only utilizing the strength of the day but borrowing of the strength that should have been conserved for the morrow. He borrowed too heavily of this strength, and in doing so made the great sacrifice.

PERSONAL ATTRIBUTES.

Mr. Speaker, one of the chief characteristics of Senator BRADY in his public life was his utter generosity toward his opponents and his utter inability apparently to harbor personal resentment against those who in the sharp clashes of political encounters attempted to bring about his defeat. In fact, I recall no other man more free from malice and resentment.

If he was generous and charitable in public life, in private life, likewise, these virtues dominated his character. He loved his fellow men. He was kindly. He was considerate. He was neighbor to those in want. His purse was open to the needy, and his benefactions were as wide apart as caring for the wants of the unfortunate in his neighborhood to the maintenance of missions in India.

A man of such characteristics reminds us that "In the same measure ye mete it out, it shall be measured to you again." So in turn Senator BRADY was loved and admired. As in life his world was full of friends, so in his departure his memory is fondly cherished by the hosts of those who wished him well.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, JAMES H. BRADY was a typical American of the pioneer type. His Scotch-Irish ancestors were pioneers in the early period of the settlement of western Pennsylvania and served with distinction in civil and military life in the early days of the Republic. Moving westward as the tide of immigration spread over the continent, the family finally settled in Kansas, where the late Senator was born and where he began his business career. The extension of enterprises and undertakings in which he became interested brought to his attention the possibilities of the young State of Idaho, and here, following the promptings of the pioneer spirit, he undertook and accomplished those enterprises of reclamation, settlement, and development which occupied his time and attention up to and beyond the time of his entry into public life.

His call to public life came as a result of his helpful and successful activities as a pioneer developer of resources, and in the performance of public duties he displayed the same devotion and energy and the same constructive ability which had made him useful and successful in his private undertakings.

As Senator BRADY'S career was typical of the best American traditions, his character was typical of the splendid type of manhood which those conditions develop and exhibited the sterling qualities which find their best development in the challenge and incentive of a region of undeveloped resources. He had the richest of all inheritances, an honest, virile, intelligent ancestry. He grew up in the best possible environment, that of an American agricultural community, with its free-school system. He had open before him the most desirable of opportunities, that of winning a place and name for himself in the development of a new and growing region and in the service of its energetic and progressive citizenship.

These are not the inheritances, the environment, and the opportunities which necessarily lead to success, but they are those which make success not only possible but certain for those worthy of them, and JAMES H. BRADY was worthy.

In considering the career of strong and worthy men whom I have known I have generally found some characteristic of the man's life and career that particularly challenged my attention, and the characteristic of our departed friend, which, as I saw and knew him, seemed among his many virtues and splendid qualities most conspicuous, was that of service.

In his early life he served to mold and develop the minds and hearts of the youth of his locality as a teacher. In later life he served in calling attention to the opportunities for securing homes and farms. Still later he served in reclaiming greater areas from the desert and making them fruitful and affording opportunities for homes upon them. He served in calling attention to and utilizing the latent resources of power in his adopted State and in harnessing it for the benefit of mankind, and, finally, he passed from a career of service in private capacity to a career of wider service as governor and as Senator. So from the beginning to the end of a busy and eventful life he served, and served faithfully and well.

The career of Senator BRADY is an illustration of the opportunities and possibilities of American life. We hear from time to time that these opportunities and possibilities are becoming less attractve and frequent and obtainable as time passes. No doubt there were folks out there in Kansas when our late friend was a boy who would have said that the opportunities for such as he were limited, just as people say at the present time. Senator BRADY'S career disproves such gloomy assertions, as the career of many a virile, forceful, ambitious man is disproving them every day, and will disprove them in the days to come.

So long as liberty prevails in the land, so long as our activities shall be based on individual initiative and effort, so long shall men of courage and capacity and honesty of purpose find the opportunities of America boundless. To be most certainly successful amid these opportunities one must be endowed with the spirit of service, which was the most conspicuous characteristic of our departed friend. We can truthfully pay to his memory the highest compliment that can be paid to a man, that in the fear of God he faithfully served his fellow men.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to meet Senator JAMES H. BRADY about the time he came into prominence in the political life of the State of Idaho. He was a big, broad-gauge westerner—full of the spirit of development and progress that has wrought such wonders in the West during the past quarter of a century. He had a constructive mind and had the requisite energy to put his ideas into action. He believed in the West—in the development of her boundless resources. His energy and enthusiasm were tempered with sound business and financial judgment and the numerous ventures in which he engaged were uniformly successful. His business acumen brought him a fortune which carried with it prosperity to the community. Such men are empire builders.

same degree of success as were his business ventures. He held numerous positions of public trust, including the two greatest honors which a State can bestow upon a citizen—the governorship and a senatorship. He discharged the duties of these important public posts with energy, enthusiasm, and a patriotic devotion to the public welfare. He was a man of courage and never truckled to popular whims or passing fancies. He had a clear conception of his public trust and followed it to the end. He knew that truth, courage, and honesty are the things worth while in public life, and he never sacrificed these or compromised on a principle. The country needs more men of his stamp in her public life.

Legislative and departmental questions of mutual interest frequently brought me in touch with Senator BRADY, and I learned more and more to respect and honor him as a public official and to esteem and regard him as a fellow man. He occupied an important place in the State of Idaho and was called to the Senate of the United States during the most important era since the Civil War. His services to both State and Nation were of the highest order and it is only fitting and proper that we should pause for this brief hour to honor his memory. His death at a comparatively early age was altogether untimely, but he leaves behind him an honorable record in both public and private life that will perpetuate his name.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the permission heretofore granted me, I append at this point the memorials and editorial comments heretofore referred to:

[From the Idaho Daily Statesman, Jan. 14, 1918.]

WASHINGTON.

Senator JAMES H. BRADY, of Idaho, died of heart disease at his Washington residence at 6.30 o'clock Sunday evening. His death was not unexpected as he has been in a critical condition since Thursday morning, and two attending physicians had announced there was no hope. For the past two days the Senator was kept alive by stimulants.

In accordance with his wishes expressed Sunday when he realized the end was near, Senator BRADY'S remains will be cremated and his ashes later will be taken to Idaho for burial. Funeral services will be held at his residence probably on Wednesday.

Senator BRADY'S fatal illness was very similar to a heart attack suffered nearly two years ago. Since that first illness he never fully regained his strength and the exertion of his recent holiday trip to Pocatello caused his collapse on the train returning to Washington last Sunday. Not until Thursday did the doctors give up hope. Twice since then he rallied and twice it was thought he might get well.

Senator BRADY was conscious through most of his illness and Sunday frequently recognized and spoke with those at his bedside. Toward evening, however, he realized the end was approaching and said goodbye to his wife, Representative SMITH, and others at his bedside. An hour before he passed away he fell into a quiet slumber, from which he never awakened.

Neither of the Senator's sons, who had been telegraphed for, reached Washington before the Senator died. They are expected Monday. Mrs. Brady's mother is coming from Seattle, and her sister, Mrs. Jayne, was with her Sunday.

Senator BORAH will announce Senator BRADY'S death in the Senate Monday, and adjournment will be taken immediately. Representative SMITH will make a similar announcement in the House.

Speaking of his late colleague Senator BORAH said:

HARD WORKING AND FAITHFUL.

"Senator BRADY was a hard working and faithful Senator. No man ever took his work more seriously or worked harder than he to represent his people. I have no doubt that his remaining in Washington through last summer's long wearing session is in large part responsible for his death."

Senator BRADY was 55 years of age last June. He was born in Indiana county, Pa., in 1862, but spent his boyhood and his first years as a young man in Kansas. He was graduated from the Olathe (Kans.) High School and studied at the State Normal School at Leavenworth.

He then taught school in Kansas for three years and spent two years editing a small newspaper. Later he engaged in general business, and then removed to Idaho in 1894 and made his home at Pocatello.

He became very successful in a business way, and invested largely in the development of irrigation schemes and later in water-power sites, the largest of which was at American Falls. This was subsequently sold. At the time of his death he owned the Mountain Home project system, and had various real estate holdings in different parts of the State, principally around Pocatello.

He first appeared prominently in the political life of the State when he became chairman of the Republican State central committee in 1904, a position which he held until 1908. He was elected governor of Idaho on November 3, 1908, and served in that office in the years of 1909 and 1910.

On January 24, 1913, the State legislature elected Mr. BRADY a United States Senator to fill out the unexpired term of the late Senator Weldon B. Heyburn. Judge K. I. Perky served by appointment as United States Senator between the time of Heyburn's death, in October, 1912, until the legislature met and elected BRADY in 1913.

TERM EXPIRED IN 1921.

On November 3, 1914, Mr. BRADY was reelected to the United States Senate for a term which expires March 3, 1921. He is survived by his widow, who was Miss Irene Moore, of Boise, and by two sons, issue of a former marriage. Both the sons live in Kansas.

Senator BRADY was a member of many important Senate committees, as follows:

Military Affairs.
Mines and Mining.
Agriculture and Forestry.
Conservation of National Resources.
National Banks.
Expenditures in the Department of Commerce.
Public Lands.
Public Buildings and Grounds.

GOVERNOR ASKS THAT BODY BE SENT HERE.

When Gov. M. Alexander learned of the death of Senator JAMES H. BRADY he immediately sent a telegram to the Senator's widow at Washington, D. C, saying:

"The State of Idaho sends words of condolence in your bereavement in the loss of your life partner. Idaho feels the loss with you, in the passing of the illustrious statesman, governor, Senator, and first citizen of Idaho.

"Idaho asks permission to take charge of his remains to bring him back to the State he so loved and honored by his citizenship and public service, that he may lie in state at the capital at Boise, and that his people may have the privilege of taking a last farewell look upon the man who has done so much for Idaho."

THANK PEOPLE OF IDAHO—BRADY FAMILY EXPRESSES APPRECIATION FOR GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gov. Alexander Tuesday received from Congressman ADDISON T. SMITH a telegram in which he extended on behalf of Mrs. James H. Brady and the sons of the late Senator BRADY their appreciation of the sympathy extended, through a message by the governor, by the people of Idaho for their bereavement. The Congressman's message said:

"Mrs. Brady and the other members of the family of Senator BRADY wish me to express to you their appreciation of the sympathy extended to them by the citizens of Idaho, so feelingly indicated in your telegram, and to say further that in accordance with the expressed wish of the Senator his remains will be cremated and his ashes interred in the State he loved so well and which had so highly honored him. When this is done his family will willingly cooperate in the furtherance of any plans his fellow citizens may wish adopted in their desire to honor his memory.

"ADDISON T. SMITH."

[From the Idaho Daily Statesman Jan. 15, 1918.]

FUNERAL OF LATE SENATOR TO BE HELD IN WASHINGTON; REMAINS TO BE CREMATED—MRS. BRADY DEEMS IT INADVISABLE TO MAKE TRIP TO IDAHO OWING TO DEMORALIZED TRAFFIC CONDITIONS; IS APPRECIATIVE—SENATE AND HOUSE PAY HONOR TO LATE MEMBER.

WASHINGTON.

Because of the disorganized conditions of railroads and the uncertainty of travel, the remains of the late Senator BRADY will not be taken to Idaho.

Funeral services for the late Senator BRADY, of Idaho, will be conducted here Wednesday afternoon by the Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, Chaplain of the Senate. Arrangements were made Monday night after the arrival of the Senator's two sons, who had been snowbound in the Middle West while trying to reach their father's bedside.

The body will be cremated and the ashes will be taken to Pocatello, Idaho, Senator BRADY'S former home.

Mrs. Brady Monday received a telegram from Gov. Alexander urging that the remains be brought to Idaho immediately. While appreciating the desire of the people to pay tribute to the late Senator, Mrs. Brady deems it unwise to attempt to make the trip under prevailing conditions.

Senator BRADY'S death was announced in the Senate by Senator BORAH and in the House by Representative SMITH, and upon adoption of appropriate resolutions both Houses adjourned out of respect.

Flags on the Capitol were at half-mast Monday, and will so remain until after the funeral. Vice President MARSHALL named a committee, consisting of Senators BORAH, GALLINGER, SMOOT, HARDING, WARREN, CHAMBERLAIN, THOMAS, KING, FLETCHER, and BECKHAM, to attend the funeral. The Speaker named a committee of 15, including the two Idaho Members.

POCATELLO PAYS TRIBUTE TO REALLY TRUE FRIEND—PEOPLE OF ALL CLASSES STUNNED BY LOSS OF MAN WHO HAS DONE MUCH FOR DEVELOPMENT OF SECTION.

POCATELLO, IDAHO.

The death of Senator BRADY falls like a pall over the business and social life of this city. All flags are at half-mast and persons of all parties pay spoken and silent tribute to a really true friend. Bankers, railroad men, laborers, and even children lament the loss of JAMES H. BRADY.

When he left here two weeks ago he told associates that after the present term he would come back and enjoy life with old cronies. He always was a very busy man with canals, electric plants, banking, ranching, and building development, but he always had time for a cheery word and smile, and by such will friends remember him.

His deeds of charity were many and unheralded, and for years he was president of the Children's Home Finding Society.

Senator BRADY won considerable publicity for the State by organizing the famous governors' special train, which toured the East in 1911. He had been president of the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, vice president of the National Irrigation Congress, and vice president of the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

Memorial plans are under way to receive Senator BRADY'S ashes, and Pocatello will ask the State of Idaho to assist in doing honor to her illustrious dead.

HOME CITY MOURNING AT SENATOR'S DEATH.

POCATELLO.

"Senator BRADY'S death is a terrible loss to Pocatello, his home city," said J. H. Peterson, former attorney general of the State, Sunday evening.

"On every hand is evidence of the fact that Pocatello citizens realize that Senator BRADY did more for and meant more to the city than any man who ever lived here. His loss will be felt by the community for many years to come.

"Personally I have been intimately associated with Senator BRADY for the last 12 or 14 years, and our association has embraced business affairs and political activities. During those years of association I learned to know Mr. BRADY well and to estimate him as one of Idaho's really big men. I feel deeply the loss of a dear personal friend, and mourn his loss to the State, which by his death has lost one who was really a great man."

RETIRING CHAIRMAN IS GRIEVED AT BAD NEWS.

"I feel that I have lost one of my best and truest personal friends," said Evan Evans, of Grangeville, retiring chairman of the Republican State central committee, Sunday night, when, just after reaching Boise, he was informed of Senator BRADY'S death.

"My relations with Mr. BRADY were more in the nature of a personal friendship of several years' standing than they were like a business relationship. Nevertheless, I appreciate to the full his services to the Nation and to Idaho. He was a man of the highest aspirations and was intensely loyal to his country and to the welfare of his fellow men."

Former Gov. F. R. Gooding, who was closely associated with the late Senator BRADY, was on a train Sunday night bound from Gooding to Idaho Falls, and could not be reached.

LOSS IS IRREPARABLE, SAYS JUDGE STANDROD.

POCATELLO, IDAHO.

The sadness of Pocatello, Senator BRADY'S home, when news of his death was received, was expressed by Judge D. W. Standrod, of this city, in the following telegram, which he dispatched to Congressman ADDISON T. SMITH for transmission to Mrs. Brady:

"While deeply grieved and so sensitive to my own great loss in Senator BRADY'S death, for he was my friend, I can hardly estimate what it will mean to the State, but I feel that just now it is irreparable. So loyal was he to his country, and so intensely sacred to him was any interest of his State, that in this time his hand, which was never spared when duty called, was of unusual strength. His activities in the permanent development of Idaho have left for him an abiding place among the people as a distinct benefactor."

"GREAT SERVICE" IS VERDICT OF HAWLEY.

Ex-Gov. James H. Hawley said, upon hearing of the death of Senator BRADY:

"The loss of Senator JAMES H. BRADY at this time is one that will be deeply felt throughout the State. He has stood behind the administration and the State throughout the trying times of the great world war. His has been a great service."

SENATOR BRADY DIED ON DUTY—D. W. DAVIS SAYS DECEASED STATESMAN REFUSED TO FOLLOW ADVICE OF HIS PHYSICIAN.

Hon. D. W. Davis, of American Falls, who was for years closely associated with Senator BRADY, was informed by telegraph Sunday night of the Senator's death. Mr. Davis, who is at San Francisco, has telegraphed to the Statesman the following tribute to Senator BRADY'S life and his life work:

"SAN FRANCISCO.

"All Idaho will mourn the death of Senator BRADY. In him our State loses a builder, a man whose greatest ambition was to see Idaho's many resources, mines, timber, agriculture, and power developed for our rapidly increasing population.

"As governor he always worked hard, endeavoring to serve the people in a way that he thought was best. I knew Mr. BRADY well and was associated with him in a business way when he was elected to the Senate. He was a man of a great deal of force and energy, and made a wonderful record of things accomplished in his first two years, as scores of homesteaders who had their affairs in Washington attended to by him can testify.

"The strong vote given him in 1914 when he was elected by a popular vote of the people was a strong manifestation of appreciation. Since that time his services have constantly grown in value to our State and Nation.

"Since the war began the Senate Military Affairs Committee, of which Senator BRADY was a member, has been in almost continuous session. His death at this time is largely due to the fact that he failed to heed the advice of his physician to take a six months' rest. When talking to me last fall I urged him to follow the physician's advice. He replied, 'Davis, I would rather die on duty than to leave my post when my country is at war.'

"And he did."

IDAHO MEN PAY TRIBUTE—JOSEPH PERRAULT AND WALTER HANSEN SURPRISED AND GRIEVED AT DEATH.

SPOKANE.

News of the death of Senator JAMES H. BRADY in the National Capital Sunday night was received with unconcealed sorrow by the north Idaho men who were in Spokane. His work in connection with the development of the State and his efforts in behalf of the party were recalled and commented on. It was the comment of all that he would be greatly missed. Senator BRADY, while not so well known in Spokane as Senator BORAH, had visited here a number of times, and numbered many Spokane men among his friends, as well as a host of personal and political friends in north Idaho.

PERRAULT'S TRIBUTE.

Joseph Perrault, of Boise, who arrived Sunday night, was surprised when told the news.

"Why, I thought he was going to pull through," Mr. Perrault said; "the reports the last few days were so favorable we were all hoping he would be spared to carry on the work he has done for Idaho. Senator BRADY was a man of most kindly disposition, and this element was what made him best liked by his friends. He was always trying to do something for his State, and how well he succeeded is attested by the great developments which he wrought in the southern part of Idaho. The district around Mountain Home is a monument to his sagacity, his energy, and his foresight. There he took head of a defunct irrigation system and put it on its feet. He had large interests in the vicinity of Pocatello, and had caused wonderful development there.

"Senator BRADY wore his honors in modest manner, and he grew and broadened in a way that was most gratifying to his friends. The more honors came to him the more kindly he was and the more he realized his responsibilities and tried to measure up to them."

GREAT LOSS TO STATE.

Walter Hansen, of Wallace, who was a warm friend of Senator BRADY, said:

"Senator BRADY was one of the best and most zealous Senators we ever had in Idaho, and there is no question but his death is a distinct loss to the State. His efforts in behalf of development are widely known in the south, but perhaps not so well known in this section. However, his work will stand as a monument to a long and well spent life. Idaho could ill afford to lose him at this time. His large means made it possible for him to do much which other Senators could not, and he spent his money without restraint to accomplish those things which seemed to him for the efforts of the State."

GENERAL REGRET AT WALLACE.

WALLACE.

General regret was manifested in Wallace Sunday night when news reached here of Senator BRADY'S death in Washington. All evening there were telephone queries received at the office of the Press Times from persons who had known the late Senator personally.

LEWISTON GRIEVED AT NEWS.

LEWISTON.

The many friends of Senator BRADY in Lewiston were grieved Sunday night at the news of his death in Washington. Comments were heard on all sides on the loss the State has sustained by the death of the man who so well represented Idaho at the National Capital.

OFFICIALS PAY BRADY TRIBUTE AT STATEHOUSE—GOVERNOR, SUPREME COURT JUDGES, MEMBERS OF DEFENSE COUNCIL, AND OTHERS UNITE IN HONORING LATE SENATOR.

State officials, members of the State defense council, and State employees paid tribute Wednesday to the memory of the late Senator JAMES H. BRADY. Memorial services were held in the house chamber of the old capitol. They commenced at 12 o'clock, corresponding with the hour set for the funeral in Washington.

The services lasted for an hour. Chief Justice Budge, of the State supreme court, presided.

The statehouse remained closed from 12 o'clock until 3 and flags hung at half mast.

ARRANGED BY GOVERNOR.

Gov. Alexander arranged the services. He called the State officials and the employees at the capitol together and invited the members of the defense council to attend.

The governor spoke briefly, when the services opened, before asking the chief justice to preside.

Chief Justice Budge spoke of Senator BRADY as he had known him in private life. He termed the late Senator the hardest worker in southeastern Idaho.

Justice Morgan, Attorney General Walters, Judge James F. Ailshie, State Treasurer Eagleson, and Dr. Reynolds, of Meridian, were the other speakers.

PRAISED BY JUDGE MORGAN.

Justice Morgan praised Senator BRADY for his patriotism, declaring that "his actions of the last few months had struck a responsive chord in every heart in Idaho.

"When the country was threatened with war, Senator BRADY stood behind the administration with the same characteristic firmness which marked his life here in Idaho.

"I am told, and I firmly believe, that his death was hastened by his patriotism."

GOVERNOR TELLS OF LOYALTY.

Gov. Alexander, speaking toward the close of the services, termed the late Senator "a man who could forget and forgive." He alluded to his political activities in the State and to his capacity for business, but dwelt at length on his loyalty to the President in the present crisis.

"When the President declared war on the autocratic German Empire Senator BRADY stood up like a man and said: 'My country first, politics afterwards.' And he died because he would not desert his post, despite his doctor's warning. He was advised that he would have to get away from Washington and rest up awhile, but he replied 'that the boys who were going to France were making sacrifices, and he would not quit them,' and he was one of the first to fall in this war."

Attorney General Walters paid his tribute to Senator BRADY as a man in public life, speaking at the request of the governor as a representative of the State. He said Idaho should be proud to have had Senator BRADY as a citizen.

TELLS OF HIS CHARITIES.

State Treasurer Eagleson told of what Senator BRADY had done for charities during his life. "While governor he gave his entire salary and more to charity."

Another incident of the late Senator's interest in charities was recited by the State treasurer when he told how he had wired and provided lights without cost to a Pocatello hospital.

Dr. Reynolds, too, touched upon the human traits possessed by Senator BRADY, telling how he spent his time and money while in Washington to help an Idaho boy far from home.

Judge Ailshie spoke of Senator BRADY as he had known him in private and public life for 20 years or more.

Justice Morgan, Judge Ailshie, and Gov. Alexander were appointed members of a committee which will draft resolutions of respect to the memory of Senator BRADY to-day.

[Copy of the resolution passed at the memorial services held for Senator JAMES H. BRADY in Boise Jan. 16, 1918.]

Whereas death has removed from the sphere of earthly activity our fellow citizen, Senator JAMES H. BRADY, and from the State of Idaho a trusted servant: Be it

Resolved, That, recognizing his long, faithful, and patriotic service in behalf of the public and his splendid endeavors and achievements in private life, we, the State officers and citizens in memorial assembly gathered, hereby express our sincere sympathy with the bereaved widow and deep regret over the loss of a useful and patriotic citizen.

BRADY HONORED BY CHURCHMEN—TRIBUTE PAID TO FINE TRAITS IN POLITICS, BUSINESS, AND RELIGION—WAS A MAN OF COURAGE—MEMBERS OF CONGREGATIONAL BROTHERHOOD PRAISE PERSONAL AND PUBLIC LIFE.

Services of memorial for the late Senator JAMES H. BRADY were held in the First Congregational Church of Boise Sunday forenoon, at which Harry K. Fritchman told of Senator BRADY'S influence in politics, Frank G. Ensign of Senator BRADY'S influence in business, and A. L. Freehafer of his influence in religion and philanthropy.

Senator BRADY was a member of the Congregational Church in Pocatello, attended the Boise Congregational church while he was governor, and was one of the founders of the Brotherhood of the Boise Church in 1910. The Rev. Shelton Bissell, pastor of the Boise church, spoke of these facts in introducing the speakers.

INFLUENTIAL IN POLITICS.

"The political field in Idaho in those days was very inviting to a man of his capacity and offered great opportunities," said Mr. Fritchman, speaking of Senator BRADY'S coming to this State in the early nineties.

"He cast his lot with the Republican Party and was not long in placing himself in the front rank of its leading men. His wise counsel and sound judgment were sought after by his associates, and his advice was freely followed."

Of Mr. BRADY as governor he said: "The State never had a more devoted executive. In the prime of life, a tireless worker, with a single purpose in view, to serve the people rightly as he saw the right, and with courage to act with fairness to all, he filled the high office with credit to himself and honor to his party. His administration will go down in the history of the State as one of the cleanest so far recorded."

A GOOD LOSER, TOO.

Of Gov. BRADY'S defeat by James H. Hawley for governor, Mr. Fritchman said: "Gov. BRADY never showed to better advantage than he did on the occasion of this defeat. He had never known defeat before. It was a bitter defeat, but he was the best loser I ever knew. He came up smiling, and as soon as the result of the election was known he congratulated Mr. Hawley as the victor and from the bottom of his heart wished him well."

As Senator: "JAMES H. BRADY was a big Senator. He was always on duty and participated in all the big questions which came before the Senate for consideration. As a department man Idaho never had his equal. Quick to grasp a business situation, he could be trusted to look after any matter of business in any of the departments at Washington, and no citizen was too humble to enlist his services.

"His loyalty to the State and Nation has never been questioned. While extremely partisan, he was first an American. The Senator had stood squarely with the administration in all the war measures, and not a single incident can be pointed out in which he has refused to uphold the hands of the President."

BRADY AS A BUSINESS MAN.

Mr. Ensign characterized Senator BRADY as "an empire builder."

"In considering the influence of JAMES H. BRADY in business," he said, "we must recognize his dynamic energy and tireless activity. Van Dyke has said, 'Genius is energy quite as much as insight.'

"As a business man Senator BRADY was one of those rare men with a vision—a vision of the unlimited possibilities of this wonderful Snake River Valley. Where others merely saw a desolate waste, his vision showed fields green with alfalfa and golden with waving grain, with herds of cattle and many homes of prosperous ranchers.

"With characteristic industry and unflagging zeal he made his business the building of an empire. His influence will last for all time in the irrigated sections, from Ashton to Mountain Home."

The speaker applied to Senator BRADY the words of Theodore Roosevelt: "Save only the preservation of the Union itself, no other task has been so important as the conquest and settlement of the West."

HIS RELIGIOUS NATURE.

Senator Freehafer cited numerous traits of Senator BRADY'S character to show that he had "the Christ spirit." He mentioned first the impression he had received from going out with Mr. BRADY into the Idaho hills and valleys and seeing how he delighted in being close to nature, and, as it seemed, seeing God in it.

"He seemed to see the nearness of the Creator in the things that were created. I noted in him a buoyant spirit, a big humanity, and a big heart.

"He loved social life and was not frozen by the dignity of high position.

"He was a lover of humanity and had a broad interest in life, which to me was evidence that he had the Christ spirit.

LOYAL TO PRINCIPLE.

"He was consistent and loyal to principle. He was in the midst of the fight between the 'wets' and the 'drys' in this State and allied himself with the 'drys' early in the contest, before that side was very popular. That he was consistent in this to the time of his death is shown by a letter which he wrote to the Congregational Brotherhood in Boise last June:

"'I thank you for your telegram with reference to the prohibition provision of the food bill. I have supported every bone-dry prohibition amendment that has come before the Senate since I have been a Member of that body, and the day before receiving your telegram I had fought in the Committee on Agriculture for six hours to retain the House amendment, and it so happened that my vote decided the question of retaining the House provision in the Senate bill, after it had been eliminated by the subcommittee, and I am hopeful that we will be successful in our fight for prohibition on the floor of the Senate.'"

Mr. Freehafer mentioned Senator BRADY'S work toward establishing a Congregational Church in the vicinity of his Washington mansion and spoke of such incidents as his care for a lonely boy who had been sent to the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

ENCOURAGED EVERY REFORM.

As governor, said the speaker, Mr. BRADY encouraged every reform.

"There was no question of his loyalty to the Government in the war. He was no coward, and he met his Maker face to face at his post of duty."

The Rev. J. E. Ingham, moderator of the Congregational conference of southern Idaho, read the Scripture at the services, and there were selections by the church quartet and a solo by Miss La Moyne Mayfield.

Members of the National Council of Women Voters, of which Senator BRADY was one of the sponsors, attended by special invitation.

[From the Pocatello Tribune.]

TRIBUTE IS PAID TO MEMORY OF BRADY—MEMORIAL SERVICES WERE HELD YESTERDAY AFTERNOON AND OLD-TIME FRIENDS GAVE LAST FOND TESTIMONIAL TO MAN WHOSE ACTIVITIES AND ENTERPRISE WERE ITEMS OF SUCH FORCE TO IDAHO AND HIS HOME CITY.

One of the most beautiful and most impressive memorial services ever held in the city was held yesterday afternoon at the Princess theater in honor to the memory of the late United States Senator JAMES H. BRADY. Throughout the afternoon personal friends of long standing listened to the eloquent words of those who knew the Senator's many fine qualities and appreciated his constructive genius so well, and the theater was packed to the limit with the associates and friends of years.

The Masonic bodies turned out in large force, and good-sized delegations were present from the Elk and Eagle lodges, while citizens at large struggled for standing room.

The meeting was presided over by A. C. Hinckley, president of the Pocatello Commercial Club, of which the Senator was the first president, and after a feeling, eloquent, and inspirative invocation by Rev. C. H. Cleaves, of the Congregational Church, of which the Senator was long a member, the chairman introduced Senator D. W. Davis, an old friend and for many years business and political associate of Senator BRADY.

THE PERSONAL SIDE.

Senator Davis dwelt at length on the achievements and personal side of Mr. BRADY'S life, from his early-day adversities to his later successes. "He was a great man for Idaho and served not only as citizen in loyal manner but as governor and any other capacity, and always as a loyal man who never quit when defeated." The official life of the deceased was given close and effective résumé, and the great promotive faculty of Senator BRADY was well emphasized by Mr. Davis in reference to the famous "Governor's special" train several years ago, and brought out the point that the Senator's indomitable will and action always brought the best results to the people. In connection with that incident he told a railroad head, "You provide the train and I'll provide the governors." It meant a world of benefit to the West.

The Senator's long activities in behalf of the State and his home city were given extended reference by Senator Davis, who emphasized the tenacity and firm purpose with which Mr. BRADY always undertook a task by citing the remark of a public official at Washington: "When BRADY wants anything from a department, the way to get rid of him is to give it to him."

"Just a year ago to-day," said Mr. Davis, "I heard his maiden speech. The Senator was then in weakened condition, and he was advised to take a rest, but he cited, 'I would rather die at my post of duty than to quit now,' and he persistently followed his desire to perform the fullest duty possible to the people at large. He was a man who knew no defeat, overcame all obstacles, and made his enterprises successful; and his death may be attributed to the unfailing zeal that actuated him under any and every occasion."

Senator Davis's address was a stirring and interesting tribute.

AN ELOQUENT ADDRESS.

Dr. John Halliwell Dickinson, who has known the Senator but a short time and to admire him for the great undertakings he had in mind, gave one of the most eloquent and eulogistic addresses ever heard in the city. The "Parson's" splendid command of English and his powerful delivery held the audience spellbound, and he dwelt entirely with the constructive genius and splendid character of the big citizen who had gone. "This is not a time for mourning," he said, "but for rejoicing in that he was the exponent for good. His word was duty, and may it be with us as it was with him." His address was of the exalted type that beautifully cited the virtues of the departed citizen.

W. H. Cleare, for 25 years a close associate of Senator BRADY, spoke feelingly and sincerely of the association he had so long enjoyed. He dwelt at length on the wonderful development of irrigation, power, and other projects of the widespread recognition of the resourcefulness and keen vision of the Senator, and the marked ability he possessed for bringing the practical side out of his vision. "He did not travel in a beaten path," said Mr. Cleare, "but he was a visionist, and he made it substantial. While he was accumulating he was creating. His great commercial enterprises are monuments to his energy and activity. In the Senate the Senator recently said to me: 'I am forgetting that I am a Republican or that the President is a Democrat.' He was willing to pledge all on the altar of patriotism, and he was closely associated with the active men and was a fine friend or a fair man to the other side. Not only was he a patriot, but he lived far beyond himself, and the loss is great."

A FORCEFUL SPEECH.

Hon. J. H. Peterson, former attorney general, and a friend from boyhood of the late Senator, was the last speaker of the day, and his address was teeming with rare epigrams and gems of pointed reference, and Mr. Peterson spoke in a manner that demonstrated his utterances were inspired by the deepest feeling.

He spoke of the great achievements that have been crowded into the 55 years of the Senator's life, of his power, irrigation, and commercial enterprises, his public undertakings and public service, his noted political career, and the vast enterprises he still had in mind.

"He was a record breaker for a little over 15 years," stated Mr. Peterson, "was an indefatigable worker, and of unfailing good nature. He never squealed when he was hurt, and no obstacle was unsurmountable to him. "Fail" was not in his lexicon. He always came up smiling, and he was what I like to refer to as typically American. When war came he forgot his private affairs and gave over his time to the public and the cause, and inspired by righteous valor of patriotism he drove his complaining body through day after day of tremendous toil. He was signally a martyr to the cause of free government.

"Paradoxical as it may seem, when blood is being poured out in rivers on the sodden soil of Europe, yet never was human life of such value. Never before has man been so honored as to die in cause so certainly just, so ambiguously unselfish. One who lays down his life in such a cause shall take it up again. These are the principles for which he gave his life. It is for us to highly resolve that he shall not have died in vain."

Other forceful expressions were brought out by Mr. Peterson:

"It does not so much matter when a man dies or of what. It does matter how he died and for what he lived.

"A man is a success or a failure according as he contributes to the happiness and welfare of others. The selfish man is forgotten before the sound of the clods upon his casket have died away.

"He was a dreamer—the most practical kind of a dreamer. He dreamed great dreams and went about it to see that they came true. He was a prophet—the most wholesome and useful kind of a prophet. He uttered great prophecies and went to work to see that they were fulfilled. He loved the people of Idaho, and his intentions toward them and his desire to serve them were so pure and unselfish as was Cæsar's will. He was a martyr to the cause of free government just as much as is the heroic soldier who is killed going over the top."

A DAY OF FRIENDS.

Through the exercises it was apparent that the event was not fused with other cause save to pay tribute to a departed and loved citizen, and all people participated.

The musical end of the program was exceptionally enjoyable. The orchestral numbers were given by Reed's orchestra and were exceedingly appropriate. The vocal solo by Mrs. H. B. Thompson was one of the most effective numbers ever given in the city on similar occasion. She sang in beautiful voice, and the selection was admirably suited to her clear and ringing soprano. She was accompanied by Miss Helen Barnard.

The vocal solo by Ed Schaeffer was an equally pleasing selection, and his tenor was decidedly effective in the choice of composition he gave. He was accompanied by Miss Dorothy Hull.

The stage was attractively arranged in American flags, in the center of which was the draped photo of the late Senator. The decorations were placed under the supervision of George L. Thompson, of the Princess Theater staff, and the use of the theater was patriotically donated to the cause by Messrs. Archibald and Carrothers.

Arrangements for the exercises were in charge of a commercial club committee composed of P. C. O'Malley, chairman, A. C. Hinckley, and Charles G. Sumner.

RESOLUTION OFFERED.

The event closed with the audience standing while the "Star-Spangled Banner" was played, and previous to this time a resolution of condolence was offered by Attorney Jesse R. S. Budge and unanimously adopted, and is given below:

Mrs. JAMES H. BRADY,
Thirty-fifth and Woodley Road, Washington, D. C.:

The people of Pocatello, assembled in memorial service, desire to express to you their respect for your honored companion, who has departed this life; to say to you in all sincerity how we deplore his loss, how we appreciate his service to his State and country, and how we honor his memory for his good works and splendid patriotism. His fellow citizens desire also to convey to you their heartfelt sympathy and to ask God's blessing upon you.

A. C. HINCKLEY,
Chairman of the Meeting.

Among the many messages of condolence received by Mrs. Brady were the following:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 14, 1918.

Mrs. JAMES H. BRADY,
Thirty-fifth and Woodley Road, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MRS. BRADY: May I not express to you my sincere sympathy? Our hearts go out to you in your great loss, and I hope that you may have comfort from the only Source from which it can come.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

THE VICE PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER,
Washington, January 14, 1918.

MY DEAR MRS. BRADY: There is nothing one can say to you now which will help in the least. Mrs. Marshall and I had so great a regard for the Senator that we can understand something of your loss and can sympathize genuinely with you.

Sorrowfully, yours,

(Signed) THOS. R. MARSHALL.

Mrs. JAMES H. BRADY,
Washington, D. C.:

There is great sorrow in the hearts of the officers and members of Pocatello Aerie, No. 119, to-day. The Allwise Father has seen fit to separate us for the time being from our dearly beloved and highly esteemed Senator and brother, JAMES H. BRADY. May God in His infinite wisdom and mercy comfort you in this your hour of greatest grief. Every officer and member of Pocatello Aerie, No. 119, Fraternal Order of Eagles, is at your service.

[Telegram from Idaho State Grange.]

RUPERT, IDAHO, January 15, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
Washington, D. C.:

The State Grange of Idaho in annual session desire that you express to the family of the late Senator BRADY sincere appreciation of his firm stand on the right side of every question wherein the betterment of the American farmer was involved. Every Idaho home joins in sorrow because of his demise and in praise of his excellent work for his country and State.

W. W. DEAL,
Master Idaho State Grange.

PROCLAMATION OF THE GOVERNOR OF IDAHO.

Whereas in the wisdom of Divine Providence, there has been taken from amongst the people of the State of Idaho the illustrious citizen, former governor, and United States Senator, Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, and in whose death the State has suffered an irreparable loss and the people are bowed in grief and submission to that decree from which there is no appeal; and,

Whereas all that is mortal of that man, JAMES H. BRADY, will be laid at rest on Wednesday afternoon, January 16, 1918, at 3 o'clock, at the city of Washington; and in order that the people of the State of Idaho may have the opportunity to pay tribute to the memory of the man who has so highly served the State:

Now, therefore, I, Moses Alexander, governor of the State of Idaho, do hereby ask that all flags upon all buildings throughout the State be floated at half mast and that the people gather in their places of worship to join with his family and the Nation to pay tribute to his memory and by such other suitable tributes as are in keeping with the feelings of the citizenship of our State and the memory of the departed one who has done so much for Idaho and whom the people honored so highly, our dear departed friend and citizen, Hon. JAMES H. BRADY.

M. ALEXANDER, Governor of Idaho.

Whereas the divine power which dominates and rules over the destinies of mankind has seen fit to remove from the living the Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, United States Senator from the State of Idaho; and

Whereas during his lifetime he was governor of the State of Idaho and president of this board of State land commissioners; and

Whereas this board is deeply sensitive of and does greatly appreciate his life and example, his many acts of kindness, and the great concern which he exercised in the interest and the welfare of the State of Idaho and of the United States of America during his term as Senator: Be it

Resolved, That this board extend its heartfelt sympathy to the bereaved widow and members of his family, and express to them the appreciation of his efforts and accomplishments while a member of this board; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be spread in full upon the minutes of this board, a copy be delivered to the press, and a copy transmitted to the widow of the deceased.

[Report of committee of resolutions of State defense council upon the death of United States Senator JAMES H. BRADY.]

BOISE, IDAHO, January 16, 1918.

We, your committee appointed to draw up resolutions upon the death of United States Senator JAMES H. BRADY, beg leave respectfully to submit the following resolutions for your approval:

Whereas the recent death of JAMES HENRY BRADY has deprived the State of Idaho of the counsels of a man who served wisely and well both as its chief executive and as its representative in the Nation's highest legislative body: Be it

Resolved, That the State defense council expresses its sense of the loss of a clear-headed pioneer in the development of the State's resources, of a strong business man, of a wise statesman, and, above all, of an intelligent and progressive man. Be it further

Resolved, That the State defense council hereby expresses its appreciation of the debt which Idaho owes to JAMES HENRY BRADY for the great part which he played in its rapid development, for the high standing in the councils of the Nation which he helped to give it.

Resolved, That the State Defense Council express to the bereaved wife and to the other members of the immediate family of the deceased its sincere sympathy, which the secretary of the council is requested to present in the proper manner, accompanied by a copy of these resolutions.

Respectfully submitted.

[Resolutions of the City Council of Pocatello.]

Whereas the will of things eternal has ruled the dissolution of a citizen, friend, and colaborer, whose sterling effort not only was vital to every element of communal welfare, but whose association and congenial being gave the inspiration of gladness and optimism, and carried the gentle influence that the sweet song of existence breathed for those who voiced the effort and made the living worth the while; and

Whereas the mystic power that sways the destiny of time and eternity has closed the eyes and quieted the soul, has stilled the voice and subdued the pulse of a loved companion, a loyal citizen, a patriotic resident, United States Senator JAMES H. BRADY; and

Whereas, duly cognizant that Pocatello has been visited with a loss that the way of time would decree as irreparable, and appreciating all that it has meant to travel the same road, to go hand in hand, in calm and storm, and to awaken to the realization that the chain has been broken: Be it therefore

Resolved, That all the flowers of gratitude accorded to one whose qualities have been for the upbuilding of his fellows are not the sole tribute we pay to the memory of him whose genius and worth have created for a greater cause that we might better appreciate those making existence worth the effort, and bask in the effulgent rays of progress, development, and advancement that have evolved from far-seeing purposes, clear vision, and substantial foundation, and resultant from which is great community extension, civic pride, commercial growth, prosperity, and the expansive idea for amplification of power; and further

Resolved, The influence of our beloved fellow citizen, within and without the State, was of that high type and character, of that forcefulness and utility that not only lived while he breathed but is enshrined in the cosmic being of the community after the mantle of darkness has closed over its author, and that we are to recall that his days of adversity and his era of prosperity were fused to the common end of betterment in the simple light of citizenship deserving of emulation; and further

Resolved, In the absence of a loyal friend, an upright citizen, a factor of worth, a stalwart servant of the people, a fearless champion of right and justice, a loyalist and a patriot in the Halls of Congress, that we can but attach to his ashes mute fealty and appreciation due to worthy ideas well conceived and faithfully wrought, strong purpose gently advanced and brought to the full temper of tried and trusted steel; and further

Resolved, That this pledge of faith in his works be sent to his widow, and that a copy be placed upon the records of this body.

[Resolutions of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, Pocatello.]

Whereas an inscrutable Providence has removed from the sphere of earthly activities our distinguished brother and friend, JAMES H. BRADY; and

Whereas the life of our departed brother exemplified in a striking degree those high principles of charity, justice, brotherly love, and fidelity, for which our order stands; and

Whereas by the adoption of these principles and virtues and by his constant desire and willingness to assist those in need or distress, he gained great esteem in the hearts of his fellow men and high place in the council of his State and Nation; and

Whereas our departed brother was thus tried and demonstrated to be, above all else, a lover of his country; and

Whereas his inordinate devotion to the exacting duties of his high office at the time of his country's great need hastened his departure from us; and

Whereas in his departure the State and Nation have lost a wise and far-seeing statesman and a son whose heart beat ever loyal and true: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of Pocatello, Idaho, in lodge assembled, In order that the sorrow we feel at the loss of our distinguished brother and the esteem in which we hold him may be made known to brothers who, in their turn, shall come and take our places, and in order that the virtues of our brother may be permanently engraved, so far as we may accomplish this, that a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this order; be it further

Resolved, That a copy thereof be communicated to the family of deceased.

[Resolutions in memory of United States Senator JAMES H. BRADY, member of Portneuf Lodge, No. 18, A. F. & A. M., Pocatello, Idaho, who was called from labor at Washington, D. C., Jan. 13, 1918.]

Whereas the Great Architect of the Universe has decreed to call from his earthly labor and activity our fellow craftsman, United States Senator from Idaho, Brother JAMES H. BRADY; and

Whereas in the untimely death of Brother JAMES H. BRADY this order has sustained a loss of one of its most distinguished members, a master builder, whose daily life, endeavor, and service exemplified in the highest degree the principles and teachings of our order; and

Whereas our city, State, and Nation has in the death of Brother JAMES H. BRADY been deprived of his wise counsel, unselfish service, and patriotic leadership at a time of need and in the hour of national crisis: Be it hereby

Resolved, That Portneuf Lodge, No. 18, A. F. & A. M., hereby acknowledges its great loss and the sincere grief of its members, so many of whom were closely associated with and so well and dearly loved the clean, upright, energetic character of the departed;

Resolved, That this lodge and order is richer for having had the benefit of his advice at its meetings and the pleasure of his association at its gatherings in the early days of the lodge, when the reciprocal communion meant so much to both, and that the lodge has been honored by having retained the membership of our illustrious departed brother until the end of his day;

Resolved, That we as a lodge, and every individual member thereof, fully appreciate the great work our brother accomplished for the city and State which he helped so much to develop and honor; that we feel a pride in the record of our chosen representative in the Capital of the Nation, his patriotic devotion and support of the President, and of every measure for the prosecution of our righteous war for liberty, for the establishment of final and permanent peace, freedom of conscience, materially and spiritually, for the pursuit of happiness of all people and nations, for true democracy of which our beloved order is the great exponent and which enters so largely into its teachings and principles;

Resolved, That we deeply and sincerely sympathize with Mrs. Brady and with the close of kin and kindred of our departed brother, that they may be assured that we share with them the loss as keenly as though we had suffered the loss of one of our own household, that we commend to them the kind care, love, and protection of our members whithersoever dispersed, that we commend to them the consoling thought and admonition, "The will of God is accomplished. So mote it be. Amen"; and be it

Resolved, By the adoption of these resolutions that a copy be forwarded to Mrs. Brady, a copy spread upon our minutes as a permanent record, and that our lodge shall be draped in mourning in honor of the memory of our distinguished departed brother.

Sincerely and fraternally submitted.

[Record of proceedings of Boise Lodge No. 77, Boise, Idaho, Jan. 22, 1918, in the memory of Brother JAMES H. BRADY, deceased.]

To BOISE LODGE 377, I. O. O. F.

BROTHERS: In approaching the performance of the duty assigned to us we are profoundly impressed with the fact that the loss of our brother, JAMES H. BRADY, is not only an affliction to our fraternity but a distinct loss to this Nation, where in its highest councils during the crisis through which the world is passing he has stood as one of the strongest supporters of the administration of our Government in its fight for the world-wide rights of man and for the people of all nations to have a political liberty and a voice in their own government. Not alone shall we miss him but he will be missed in the councils of the Nation, where meet its great sons to determine and work out the measures which will finally protect the rights of men. In the lofty and patriotic stand which he has taken in the United States Senate he has endeared himself to the people of this Nation. However much we may revere his memory and the value of his services we can not change conditions and must bow to the inevitable. Therefore be it

Resolved, That with an abiding faith in the grandeur of an enduring brotherhood and believing that our sorrow and loss has been chastened and sanctified by his splendid record, be it

Resolved, That Boise Lodge No. 77, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, bears grateful testimony to the memory of our departed brother, that we fully appreciate and commend his good deeds and his faithful life and service as worthy of our emulation. Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the bereaved widow of our departed brother, and that a copy be spread upon the minutes of this lodge, and our charter of the lodge be draped in mourning for a period of 30 days.

THE VANGUARD,
THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN VOTERS,
Tacoma, Wash., January 16, 1918.

Mrs. JAMES H. BRADY.

DEAR MADAM: I have been directed to send you the following: On January 15, 1918, resolutions were passed by the executive board of the National Council of Women Voters, in Tacoma assembled, expressing deep regret that death had called Senator JAMES H. BRADY from this world to a wider sphere of usefulness.

Recalling with gratitude the fact that this association owes its organization to Senator BRADY, it is with a profound sense of personal loss that the council begs to tender its sincere sympathy to Mrs. Brady.

EDITH THOMAS FRANSIOLI,
Secretary pro tempore.

[From the African Methodist Episcopal Church.]

The following resolution was passed by the members of the African Methodist Episcopal Church:

To the bereaved wife, relatives, and friends of the late United States Senator JAMES H. BRADY, of the State of Idaho, and resident of the city of Pocatello:

We, the colored citizens of this city, regret very much to lose such a dear friend in the person of Senator BRADY, who while living proved himself a gentleman and friend to all humanity regardless to race and color, therefore the entire colored population of the city of Pocatello, at the African Methodist Episcopal Church, 336 North Third Avenue, unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

Whereas Almighty God, in His wise providence, has taken from our midst and from the Congress of the United States the soul of our beloved Senator, friend, and neighbor; and

Whereas we feel with deep regret the loss of such noble character: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the colored citizens of Pocatello, at the hour of 8.30 o'clock, Sunday evening, January 20, while assembled for services, show our regret of the shocking and sad loss to us, and at the same time our submission to God's will by rising and softly chanting "Nearer my God to Thee"; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be given to the Pocatello Tribune for publication and a copy sent to Mrs. James H. Brady on behalf of the colored citizens of this city.

Signed in behalf of said citizens by

Rev. J. A. DUNCAN,
Pastor African Methodist Episcopal Church,
336 North Third Avenue, Pocatello, Idaho.

Resolution.

Whereas on January 13, 1918, death claimed the life of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY, United States Senator from Idaho; and

Whereas in the parting from life of this distinguished citizen the Nation has lost a patriotic servant and the Commonwealth of Idaho and the West a loyal, able friend; and

Whereas through the death of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY Lewiston and this immediate section keenly feels this loss, because of his close association with the deceased, whose every effort was at all times available to the people of this community in their public work: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Lewiston Commercial Club, That this organization joins with the people of the State in mourning the passing of JAMES H. BRADY; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transcribed on the permanent records of the Commercial Club and that the original be sent to widow of the deceased.

Adopted by the Lewiston Commercial Club January 22, 1918.

P. R. BEVIS,
President Lewiston Commercial Club.
JESSIE ADAM,
Secretary.

To Mrs. JAMES H. BRADY:

A solemn occasion reminds us that Idaho has suffered the loss of her foremost citizen and the Nation a genuine statesman at a time when dependable men, in high places, are needed.

In obedience to the Divine will JAMES H. BRADY has been removed from earth and its associations, but though he be dead, shall he not live again?

His voice has been stilled, his activities have ceased; yet in everything that means the upbuilding of the State he so much loved, in everything that calls for unselfish, patriotic devotion to the principles of true Americanism, we may well imagine that he still lives; that he still counsels us to forget everything, and to live only for the purpose of furthering the cause of a world-wide humanity.

He died at his post of duty amid conditions that try men's souls and that put to the utmost test every fiber of our national life.

Silent is our departed friend and brother now, but could his voice be heard again for each of us he would utter this solemn exhortation:

"So live, that when thy summons comes to join
That innumerable caravan that moves
To that mysterious realm, where each must take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go, not like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to the dungeon; but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust; approach the grave
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

[Resolutions Idaho Council of Women Voters.]

Whereas all that was mortal of our friend JAMES H. BRADY has been removed from our view, while the immortal part of him has been transferred to a sphere of unrestricted activity and enlarged usefulness: Therefore be it

Resolved by the National Council of Women Voters in Idaho, in regular meeting assembled, That in the passing over of JAMES H. BRADY, former governor of Idaho and late Senator from Idaho to the Congress of the United States, Idaho has been deprived of the services of a useful, able, and energetic public servant and the country of a devoted and intensely loyal citizen. The National Council of Women Voters of Idaho will ever hold in grateful remembrance Senator BRADY'S generous and liberal aid, while governor of the State, to the national organization of women voters, since, as governor, he officially invited the governors of the suffrage States to each send a representative woman to a meeting held at Tacoma on January 14, 1911, then and there to effect the national organization of women voters. Gov. BRADY himself journeyed to Tacoma and presided at the various sessions, and by his presence, business advice, and financial assistance helped launch and speed on an even keel the national craft on its initial voyage of helpfulness to the cause of the equality of women before the law. Be it further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transcribed upon the minutes of the Boise Chapter, Council of Women Voters, and a copy thereof sent to Mrs. James H. Brady, together with the assurance of our profound sympathy in her bereavement and loss.

[From the Tacoma (Wash.) Tribune.]

SENATOR BRADY FRIEND OF SUFFRAGE HERE—EMMA SMITH-DE VOE RECALLS EFFORTS OF IDAHO STATESMAN.

In the death of Senator JAMES H. BRADY, of Idaho, the National Council of Women Voters loses the western statesman who was chiefly responsible for its formation and who was one of the staunchest friends of suffrage in the West. Mrs. Emma Smith-De Voe, of Tacoma, intimate friend of Senator and Mrs. BRADY, Tuesday recalled some of the circumstances attending the stirring scenes when the State of Washington adopted woman suffrage in 1910. Senator, then Gov. BRADY, of Idaho, has been her chief adviser during that memorable fight.

After the victory Mrs. De Voe went to Boise, Idaho, for one more conference in the governor's mansion. There before the blazing logs in his wide fireplace they held council. When it was over Gov. BRADY issued this call to the governors of the other four suffrage States:

"Whereas on November 8, 1910, the electors of the State of Washington voted a constitutional amendment giving the women of that State the right of suffrage, making five States west of the Missouri River that have placed this God-given right in their hands;

"I, JAMES H. BRADY, governor of the State of Idaho and chairman of the advisory board of Washington campaign committee of said State, believe that the time has arrived when the enfranchised women of the West should extend a helping hand to their sisters in the eastern and other States in securing the ballot, and I hereby call a convention, to be held in the city of Tacoma, Wash., on January the 14th, 1911, for the purpose of organizing an association of national scope of the women voters of America, and I hereby appoint Margaret S. Roberts, of Boise, Idaho, as delegate to said convention, with full power to act on all matters coming before the same, and I respectfully request the governors of all the States where women have the right of suffrage to appoint one delegate to said convention, with authority to organize a national association."

There was prompt concurrence by all the governors, each of whom named and duly authorized a woman commissioner for this important meeting. Gov. Brooks, of Wyoming, named Mrs. Zell Hart Deming, of Cheyenne; Gov. Shafroth, of Colorado, named Mrs. Mary C. C. Bradford, of Denver; Gov. Spry, of Utah, named Mrs. Susa Young Gates, of Salt Lake City; and Gov. Hay, of Washington, named Mrs. Virginia Wilson Mason, of Tacoma.

These commissioners met on the morning of January 14, 1911, Gov. BRADY himself calling them to order and stating the object of the meeting. The scene was laid in the large colonial home of Mr. and Mrs. John Q. Mason, in Tacoma, and there was organized the National Council of Women Voters.

The first officers elected were: President, Mrs. Emma Smith-De Voe, Tacoma; vice president at large, Mrs. Harriet G. R. Wright, Denver, Colo.; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Bertha Knatvold Kittilsen, Tacoma; recording secretary, Mrs. Leona Cartee, Boise, Idaho; treasurer, Dr. Cora Smith King, Seattle, Wash.; auditor, Mrs. C. H. McMahon, Salt Lake City, Utah.

EDITORIAL COMMENTS.

[From the Idaho Statesman, Boise.]

When a summary is made of the career of JAMES H. BRADY, the United States Senator over whose death the people of Idaho mourn today, those who knew him personally will be apt to give precedence to his personality, rather than to the record which he made as a highly successful business man or to the political record which kept him prominently before the public. It will be the kindly, generous, and sympathetic side of the man, whose charity was unstinted and who was always willing to help, which will be emphasized by his friends and associates, and even by those who knew him only slightly.

Many sections of southern Idaho are to-day enjoying a prosperity and a development which are directly attributable to Senator BRADY'S business sagacity. His great successes in large ventures were made on projects which benefited the people of the State as well as himself, and any one of several of his projects would be monument enough for an ordinary man.

Whatever Senator BRADY put his hand to he directed with an earnestness and a continual pressure that brought results. This is as true of his political activities as it is of his personal business affairs. While he was governor of Idaho he was a man who pushed things along—got things done, and when he was advanced to the larger sphere of usefulness in Washington this same spirit was manifest. Thousands of his constituents can testify to his earnest services in departmental matters at the National Capital. He accomplished things and was preeminently a builder, and always he had a sincere love for Idaho and a genuine concern for the welfare of the State.

When the Nation became involved in the great war Senator BRADY immediately aligned himself as a whole-hearted supporter of the administration. Victory over Germany and the future safety of his country—those were the things to which he gave unstintedly of time and labor and thought.

No one knew better than Mr. BRADY himself the personal danger to his health which his hard work on the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate entailed. His physicians warned him that overexertion would inevitably shorten his life, and many of his friends urged upon him the advisability of a moderate slowing down of his many activities. To these pleas Senator BRADY replied that his own life was a matter of minor importance and that he must give to his country without stint the best work of which he was capable.

PASSING OF SENATOR BRADY.

A public official is soon forgotten by the public unless he be among the few who has stood out with national distinctiveness.

A builder lives in the public mind, for his monuments are ever in evidence.

It was as a constructive genius in the field of industry that the late United States Senator BRADY, of Idaho, will be the longest held in public remembrance, not that he had not served to the fullest capacity permitted by failing health, nor that he had not succeeded in performing genuine service for his State in the National Hall of legislation, but because of the visualization of his industrial activities.

Senator BRADY'S constructive efforts were not always as successful as he would have had them nor as profitable to himself as the public assumed, but they all helped build up his State. They encouraged other investment and additional population.

The Senator was a tireless worker in private life and in public life until ill health forced him to slow down, but, even though gripped by a fatal malady, he went on in both capacities, and undoubtedly his end was hastened by continuation of his business activities at a time when he should have been in practical retirement.

[From the Pocatello Tribune.]

It is extremely difficult for those who were so closely associated as friends with the late Senator JAMES H. BRADY to reconcile themselves to the belief that he is dead, and the thought insists that he is simply away on his duties and will return. But the calm consciousness dawns that when he does return it will not be as the keen, active, optimistic individual whose life and energies were so closely interwoven with the affairs of the State, and more particularly those of his home town, Pocatello, where for years his name and operations stood constantly and firm for uplift and upbuilding. His keen perception, quick decision, and great energy are lost to the State, and as the days go along it is only too strongly realized that the loss is very great.

No public man in years has dropped from the ranks of human endeavor whose work and activity will be missed to so great a degree by the people of Idaho as that of Senator BRADY. His effort, friendship, and wealth had an influence and firm hold on nearly every community in the State, and it was ever his ambition to advance the work of the people, to further the aspirations of a locality, and to follow out the theory of "making two blades of grass grow where but one grew before."

His dynamic force was the constant admiration of those who knew him intimately. No way was too long or no night too dark to be of service to a worthy individual or a deserving project, and he possessed the wonderful vitality and decisive action to dispose of a monumental bulk of affairs in remarkably short time. A study of his methods of many years readily inclines one to the belief that he could not have been constituted otherwise and accomplish so many successes in 20 years' time. He was never known to drift on any process, and was quick to act either for or against.

It was his vast grasp of situations and affairs, the fine purpose of associating with him the best elements of society at large, that at all times commanded the greatest respect of his opponents. And aside from the cause of party, it is recalled that one of the characteristics most strongly appealing to his great circle of adherents was his stern avoidance of radicalism on any subject. He gave and took with all his forces. His radical Republicanism, however, left no doubt as to his exact stand with the party under any and all conditions, and his firmness and personal activity has on more than one occasion contributed very vitally to snatching victory from the claws of apparent defeat.

As time drifts along we rather surmise that the things built by JAMES H. BRADY will become of greater moment than they appeared when he was alive. He had that master constructive mind, and coupled it with his wealth to produce results for greater and better times.

Eulogy is not essential. He had much of eulogy while yet he breathed, but now "flowers on coffins laid impart no incense to departed days."

And one would almost deny the cause of the inscrutable way of fate to remove so potent a citizen in the good golden period of moderate years, and his memory will abide with us and his constructive genius live for aye, and rather than contemplate that he is gone for all time, while facing such stern fact, a pleasant memory would rather deduce: "Like one who wraps the mantle of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

DEATH OF SENATOR BRADY.

In the death of Hon. JAMES H. BRADY the State of Idaho has suffered the loss of one of her most energetic and constructive citizens. He was a builder and has left many monuments to his enterprise, thrift, and business forethought.

As a public official he was hard working and energetic, and his intense loyalty to his country was his guiding star in the performance of public duty. His services in the Senate have been especially valuable since war was declared, and, although in poor health, he remained at his post of duty and died literally fighting for civilization and democracy.

The Signal has not supported Senator BRADY in all of his undertakings, but we have admired his forcefulness and staying qualities, and sincerely join in a tribute to his many good qualities and the service he has rendered the State.

LOYAL SENATOR BRADY.

Idaho has one special reason for honoring the memory of JAMES H. BRADY. All through the critical times leading up to the declaration of war, and more particularly after that declaration, Senator BRADY was right. All the ability he had, all the influence he commanded, he threw whole-heartedly on the side of his country. The Government did not move as rapidly as he thought it should have moved in preparations for war; the break with Germany did not come as soon as he thought it should have come, but he did not for an instant permit this feeling to interfere with his loyal support of his country. His every act and every utterance was governed by the firm conviction that the Government—the men in positions of power and responsibility in the Nation—were entitled to the earnest support of every citizen in the land. An intense partisan, Senator BRADY was willing to lay his partisanship aside for the time in order that his country might present a solid front to the common enemy. Out of harmony with some of the things the Government was doing, he was willing to leave the correction of these minor things until after the main issue was decided—until the war was won. On the alert always to make political capital out of the mistakes and weaknesses of the opposition, and always ready to advance the interests of his own party, Senator BRADY suppressed his political desires in order that the best interests of his Nation might go forward. Idaho will remember these things. Citizens of the State will place this record to the credit of the departed Senator, and they will honor his memory for the patriotic course he pursued in the supreme crisis of the Nation.

DEATH OF SENATOR BRADY IS GREAT LOSS TO IDAHO.

Reports of the condition of Senator JAMES H. BRADY for a week or more fully prepared the people of Idaho for the news of his death, but it did not lessen the profound and universal sorrow with which it was received. Although long prominent in the business and political affairs of Idaho, it was not until he entered the United States Senate that his highest and best qualities were recognized by the people of his State. Senator BRADY was first elected to serve the unexpired term of Senator Heyburn, who also died at his post of duty in the National Capital, and was the last Senator closen by the State legislature. Upon the expiration of his term, Senator BRADY was elected for a full term of six years by popular vote and had three years to serve at the time of his death. Like his distinguished predecessor, Senator BRADY was a native of Pennsylvania. He was educated in the public schools and in the State Normal School at Leavenworth, Kans. He taught school for three years, edited a newspaper for two years. He came to Idaho in 1895, locating in Pocatello, which has since been his home. He was chairman of the Republican State central committee during the campaigns of 1904 and 1908. He was chairman of the Idaho delegation to the Republican national conventions in 1900 and 1908. He was elected governor of Idaho in 1908. On January 24, 1913, he was elected Senator by the legislature, and on November 3, 1914, he was reelected by popular vote.

In the Senate Senator BRADY at once earned recognition from his colleagues by his ready grasp of big questions, and while not an orator, he nevertheless had the faculty of expressing his views with vigorous clearness, which never failed to impress his hearers. He was a tireless worker, and his unwillingness to abandon his work and take a needed rest no doubt accounts for his untimely death. The most humble citizen of Idaho had a firm friend in Senator BRADY, and hundreds of prospectors, homesteaders, and others in all parts of the State will attest to his prompt and faithful attention to matters in which they were concerned in the various departments. With his service in the Senate he had steadily grown in the esteem of the people of Idaho, who watched with satisfaction his expanding influence in that body. At the time of his death he was the ranking member of the Committee on Military Affairs and was one of the subcommittee which framed the law creating the great National Army we see to-day. Although not in accord with the President on many questions pertaining to the attitude of this country toward the European war, he never faltered in giving the administration the most loyal support in declaring war and in all measures necessary to bring speedy victory to American arms.

In the death of Senator BRADY Idaho has lost not only a faithful and forceful representative in the Senate, but a citizen who has contributed much toward shaping the political and industrial destiny of the State.

SENATOR BRADY'S DEATH A NATIONAL LOSS.

In the death of JAMES H. BRADY Idaho has lost, as Senator BORAH says, "a hard-working and faithful Senator." But his death is more than a State grief; it is a loss to the Nation.

As member of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs and of the subcommittee that conducted extended hearings in December, 1916, on universal military training, Senator BRADY had amassed a fund of military knowledge and had developed a keen and intelligent understanding of preparedness problems that the Nation can ill afford to lose in this hour of trial.

For six weeks this subcommittee held laborious sessions daily. Senator BRADY was in constant attendance, and his innumerable questions and comments revealed a keen and able mind and a high spirit of American patriotism.

He had no pacifist delusions. He wanted to strengthen the Regular Army, federalize the National Guard, and develop a democratic system of universal training. He wanted to carry physical training into the schools, for the benefit of both the girls and the boys, and he believed that in the period of military training of the young manhood of the country vocational education should be linked up with military drill and instruction.

Senator BRADY understood early that we could not adequately build up the Army and Navy with the volunteer system, and that resort to the draft was advisable. When Gen. Scott, Chief of Staff, was before the committee Senator BRADY brought out in a series of questions the fact that "the Government had made every possible effort to get good men to volunteer in the service"; that extraordinary efforts had been resorted to in recruiting; and that the men were not coming in the desired numbers.

"This seems to indicate to me," was his conclusion, "that it is a very true statement that it is going to be impossible, under existing conditions, to secure these volunteers."

Maj. Gen. Wood told the committee that "this country is in effect unprepared," and added:

"We need, and need immediately, a system for the training of men, and we should push forward the manufacture of munitions and equipment with all possible speed. The lessons of the present militia mobilization, with its incompleteness of equipment, its shortages in all directions, extending to the present moment in many things—in the matter of clothing, shortage of artillery, shortage in various directions—all indicate the need of a systematic and well-thought-out preparation, and that without delay."

Senator BRADY promptly voiced his approval of that expert counsel.

When another witness said that there were already a number of excellent military training schools in the country, Senator BRADY remarked:

"The trouble with that is that it is simply in local places. It does not apply generally to the people of the United States. Now, that would be something like our baseball games and our football games, where 18 or 25 take their physical exercises and 25,000 or 30,000 sit in idleness and watch them perform. We want to find some method by which we can give a reasonable amount of physical training to all the youths of the United States."

It was unfortunate for the Nation that Senator BRADY's health broke under the severe strain of his conscientious labors. He tried to meet all the exacting demands on his time and thought from his home constituency and at the same time master the great problems before the American people. With the possible exception of Senator CHAMBERLAIN, of Oregon, it is doubted if any other Senator had a broader or more intelligent grasp of the military needs of the Nation.

JAMES H. BRADY.

In the death of Senator JAMES H. BRADY the West loses an able and vigorous champion and Idaho a statesman who was a big factor in its industrial and agricultural development. Senator BRADY stood by the West at every turn of the road, and he had an unfailing faith in the future of his adopted State. He came to Idaho less than a quarter of a century ago, a stranger willing to do his part.

It is a fine tribute to the western spirit, as well as to Senator BRADY'S ability, to note the progress made by him in a comparatively short period of time. Rising from the ranks, he was elected governor of the State. Later he was appointed to fill the unexpired term of United States Senator Heyburn, deceased, and in 1914 he was reelected by popular vote.

The death of Senator BRADY brings about a rather important political situation. Gov. Alexander will appoint a Democrat to serve until next November, at which time Idaho will elect two Senators instead of one. But whoever is appointed and whatever may be the result of the November election, Senator BRADY has left a fine record of achievement that may well be emulated by his successor.

Only a few days ago the West suffered a similar loss in the death of Senator Newlands, of Nevada. He, too, was a man who held the interests of the West close to a warm heart, and his experience, together with his alignment with the majority in Congress, made him an important factor in legislation. The State of Utah will share to an extent the loss sustained by the adjoining States of Idaho and Nevada.

THE LATE SENATOR BRADY.

The United States, and particularly the State of Idaho, suffered a distinct loss in the death of Senator JAMES H. BRADY, who died in Washington on Sunday. Like the late Senator Newlands, of Nevada, who predeceased him a short time ago, Senator BRADY was a conspicuous figure on important committees although representing a more or less inconspicuous State.

The Idaho statesman was an example of what is best in American public life. Born in humble circumstances, he rose by his own efforts to the governorship of the State of his adoption, and finally was elected and reelected to the Senate of the United States to represent that State whose interests were always nearest his heart.

Particularly does the woman-suffrage movement lose a friend in Senator BRADY, who as long ago as 1910 publicly advocated the enfranchisement of women, and at the time of his death was chairman of the National Council of Women Voters.

WEST DOUBLY BEREAVED.

The West has suffered two severe losses recently in the death of capable and favorite sons chosen to represent this section in the national halls of legislation. In both instances Utah people have sensed an almost direct and personal bereavement, for in each case the Commonwealth that was more immediately bereft is our next-door neighbor—Nevada on the west and Idaho on the north.

The late Senator Newlands of the former State was a power in the upper House of Congress, a legislator whose experience and penetrating habit of mind caused his utterances to be listened to with respect, and his influence to be far-reaching and potent. Upon those subjects of national importance in which he specialized—and these, while not necessarily sectional in their character, were of peculiar interest to the West—he was an authority from whose judgment it was seldom possible to take logical appeal. Among the large men who foregather at Washington to do the Nation's business he always held his own on all occasions, in some respects overtopping his colleagues, and reflecting always credit upon the State which in honoring him had honored itself.

Of Senator BRADY, of Idaho, whose untimely death is just announced, all of the foregoing may also be said, and more. By reason of the closeness of business relations between Idaho and Utah, their identity of interests, and the intimate sympathy of their populations, which have all but dispensed with even the imaginary line that marks their respective political boundaries, we on this side of the line have been as deeply interested in the Gem State's affairs as her own citizens. So when Idaho chose JAMES H. BRADY to be her governor Utah was well pleased, and when he was later sent to the United States Senate his host of friends here were as much gratified as were his followers there. He had proved his worth, his courage, his manhood—in a word, his possession of the attributes that go to constitute the foundation of human greatness. He had shown himself a stalwart friend to Utah's people and interests when friends were needed, standing squarely for the right as he saw it, alike against persuasion, popular clamor, and partisan threat. In addition to individual admiration for the man by those who knew him, we of Utah therefore should be guilty of ingratitude if we fail to keep his name in pleasant memory or fail to join in the sorrow of his own State at the loss of a gallant man who has served us all so well.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the resolutions heretofore adopted, the House will now stand adjourned until to-morrow.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.), in pursuance with the order heretofore adopted, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, January 27, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.
